MPA told decade holds new battles

By STUART J. ELLIOTT and STUART EMMRICH

DORADO BEACH, P.R.—At times, the 1982 American Magazine Conference seemed like a veterans' reunion.

Executives of the nation's top magazines spent much of their time last week recalling the wars they fought and won in the 1970s: Slowing the rise in postal rates, bringing paper costs under control, convincing readers and advertisers they must increase the prices they pay.

Yet, unlike the veterans who spend their lives refighting old battles, the top brass here realize there are more to come.

"The challenges of the 1980s will be difficult to meet," said William F. Gorog, the new president of the Magazine Publishers Assn., which sponsored the conference. He added that unlike past challenges, which could be handled as they arose, "We're not going to have that luxury of waiting for things to develop."

"We are going to have to be more efficient managers. If we aren't, we are going to be kicked in the tail by advertisers and consumers," said James Horton, publisher

Election tv key to net news race

By DIANE MERMIGAS

Mid-term election coverage by the three commercial tv networks Tuesday will be the latest wave of combat in their intensifying war for news prestige and ratings.

Industry sources speculate each network will spend more than $2 million on a single day and night of election coverage.

The election of senators, congressmen and governors, which, except for key races has been of lesser interest to the networks in the past, this year comes at a critical time in the evening news sweepstakes.

NBC is struggling to establish viewer support for its new anchor team and to reverse its ratings slide, having gone from an average 10.2 rating and 22% share of the national tv audience July through September, 1981, to an average 9.4 rating and 20 share for the same three months this year. AS BURGER KING PULLS BACK

Big Mac ads hit back at BK

By RICHARD KREISMAN

McDonald's Corp. is unleashing a Big Mac attack on Burger King, just as Burger King begins a phase-out of its controversial comparative drive, the result of an out-of-court settlement of the two lawsuits brought by McDonald's and Wendy's.

The Miami chain on Friday agreed to "phase out" the comparative commercials, saying, "their purpose has been served." Why Burger King decided to settle the pending cases is not known; as late as last Wednesday Burger King USA president J. Jeffrey Campbell said the chain had not ruled out an extension of the publicity-sparking campaign. Its franchisees were enthusiastic about it and the sales results were positive.

In a prepared statement, Burger King said the three parties had agreed not to disclose the terms of the agreement. A BK spokesman did say the spots would be phased out "through December." No replacement advertising will be used.

No. 1 McDonald's, however, is bouncing back from the month-long comparative barrage with a wave of interview-format customer testimonials. The first spot, which broke this past weekend, features McDonald's patrons talking about food, food quality, restaurant environment, service and value.

The theme of the advertising is: "That's my McDonald's."

More testimonial spots are in the works, according to William Youngclaus, vp-marketing, who said the company has not determined how long the campaign will run. The commercials are going to be rotated with McDonald's current network advertising.

It is believed that the new spots are an interim effort. McDonald's agency, Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, currently is working on a new over-all campaign for the Oak Brook, Ill., chain. That effort could break as soon as early 1983, sources report. Mr. Youngclaus said, "It is

Kroll becomes Y&R titan in exec shifts

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

New York—Alexander Kroll's appointment as the first president Young & Rubicam Inc. has had in 16 years clearly crowns him as heir apparent to the company's chief executive officer, chairman Edward Ney. He takes a post that has been vacant since the departure of George Gribbin, who held the job from 1961 to 1966.

As the 44-year-old Mr. Kroll, who had been president of Y&R USA, its major unit, takes another big stride in the Y&R corporate hierarchy, his colleague Alexander Brody, president of Y&R International, steps out of the race (AA, Oct. 4). Some agency sources say Mr. Brody, 49, believed the president-chief operating officer title should be his. But according to Mr. Kroll, "Mr. Brody decided to take down his world-traveling pace a bit" and move "to a slightly slower gait." The new Y&R Inc. president added that the initiative for Mr. Brody's move came from Mr. Brody.

Another Y&R rising star, Peter Georgescu, 43, who has headed the company's central region as exec vp-director, takes the post of president of Y&R International. Jay McNamara, 48, exec vp-manager of Y&R New York, succeeds Mr. Kroll as head of the USA company. Mr. McNamara in turn is succeeded by John P. McGarry, 42, exec vp-director of marketing, Y&R USA.

All the appointments are effective Jan. 1.

Mr. Brody will retain his seat on the Y&R board, his membership on the Dentsu-Y&R committee and will be working on creative projects for the agency worldwide.

Mr. Kroll, who came up the creative side, indicated there will be some differences in management priorities. "I want to be more involved in the creative, media and research products of the agency, and to do my best to make them the best in the different markets," Mr. Kroll said. "I want to make sure we have a structure that always allows the best people to keep their hands on accounts, and not to be sucked up into other things like administration and managing. My role is to persistently execute these ideas."

But, he stressed, Mr. Ney "is still boss. I won't top Ney. We will do different things."

J&J, FDA ready new spots

By NANCY GIGES

Rebuilding of the Tylenol brand began in earnest last week with the resumption of regular advertising for Tylenol maximum strength sinus tablets, Tylenol children's chewable tablets and liquid and Co-Tylenol cold tablets.

Meanwhile, reaction to the earlier Tylenol contaminations continued on several fronts:

- As the number of reports received by the Food & Drug Administration of poisoning attempts through food and drug tampering exceeded 270, that agency rushed a 30-second public service tv spot to stations in an effort to tell consumers how to take precautions without creating widespread alarm.
- Bristol-Myers plans to run newspaper ads early this week in Colorado to tell consumers how to exchange Excedrin capsules for tablets. This measure follows a poisoning incident in that state that led the company to remove all Excedrin capsules from Colorado shelves and urge consumers to switch to tablets.
- FDA sent its recommendation for a tamper-resistant regulation to the Office of Management & Budget for review and expects to pub-

RC Cola account under review, too

Arby's studies major revamp

By ROBERT REED
and RICHARD KREISMAN

Stepped-up competition within the soft drink market is forcing Royal Crown Cola Co. to re-evaluate marketing strategies for its cola brands, prompting an ad agency review. And parent company Royal Crown Cos.' fast-food subsidiary, Arby's, is not only reviewing agencies but working with a marketing consulting company about a major repositioning of the chain.

The Atlanta-based chain is readying a new strategy that calls for a significant repositioning, though roast beef is expected to remain on the menu. Although not disclosing details of the new strategy, Larry Krueger, senior vp-marketing, said, "Arby's has a high reliance on beef and total beef consumption is on a downward trend. We are leaders in a market that's declining. We are now in the process of deciding what to do about that fact."

■ The strategic change is most likely to focus on Arby's menu and service concepts. In the past year, sales impetus has come from the rollout of its Deli Specialties sandwich line, which now accounts for about 20% of total chain sales, Mr. Krueger said. The chain's diversified menu is the focus of a new network tv campaign from LPG, which broke last week (AA, Oct. 11).

The chain is looking for an agency with strong marketing and research credentials to replace Lois Pitts Gershon, New York. It already has queried a number of New York agencies on a pitch. The chain spends $6 million to $9 million on advertising nationally.

A decision is expected by December.

Per-unit Arby's sales reportedly lag behind industry averages and

Kero-Sun to break issue ads

By GAY JERVEY

To combat recent negative publicity surrounding the safety and efficacy of its kerosene heaters, Kero-Sun will soon break "issue-type" advertising in newspapers, consumer and trade magazines.

While declining to give budget figures, a spokeswoman for the Kent, Conn.-based company indicated that the effort would be "sizable." Young & Rubicam, New York, is the agency.

The campaign comes on the heels of a $41 million lawsuit that Kero-Sun filed last month against Consumers Union, publisher of "Consumer Reports" magazine. In its October issue, the publication recommended against the use of kerosene heaters. Three million units were sold in 1981 alone.

With sales of $1.3 billion a year, Kero-Sun reportedly claims 35% of the American kerosene heater business. Some sources are predicting 1982 sales will top 6 million units.

Despite their popularity, "CR" feels kerosene heaters to be more dangerous than electric heaters, which cost considerably more to

The big five-oh—and what it spent

By Louis J. Haugh

The nation's 50 leading retailers increased their advertising and promotion investment almost $1.2 million a day last year over 1980. The gain accompanied a sales increase of $55.7 million a day over 1980.

These 50 companies, according to an exclusive report conducted for Advertising Age Magazine, increased their advertising investment in 1981 by 11.4% over 1980's figure. Total spending last year totaled $4.2 billion. Their sales increased by 11% to $204.9 billion.

The figures for these companies generally outpaced the inflation rate and reflected continuing efforts by these retailers to woo customers in generally difficult economic times. Sears, Roebuck & Co., for example, increased its advertising outlays as part of an effort to turn its giant retail business around.

The advertising-to-sales ratio of the top 25 general merchandisers climbed slightly last year while the ad-to-sales ratio of the top 25 food store operators dipped slightly.

Over the last nine years since ADVERTISING AGE began reporting sales and advertising figures for the top 50 retailers, sales have grown from $96.7 billion and advertising from $2.2 billion. While average year-to-year sales among these companies have increased 12.4%, advertising has increased an average of 9.9% each year. They have remained fairly consistent advertisers.

Last year, only five of the top 50 retailers reported sales of less than $1 billion. Twenty-five of these companies invested more in advertising, most of it in local ads, particularly in newspapers, than did Canon U.S.A., the 100th largest national advertiser in the U.S., as profiled in the 100 Leading National Advertisers issue (AA, Sept. 9). Three of these retailers, Sears, K mart Corp. and J.C. Penney Co., are among the largest national advertisers, as well. Two others, Batus retail division—which includes Gimbel's, Saks Fifth Avenue, Kohl's, Thimbles and, beginning in 1982, Marshall Field & Co.—and Montgomery Ward & Co., are profiled as part of their parent companies, B.A.T. Industries PLC and Mobil Corp. respectively, in that issue.

There have been a number of changes among the top 25 general merchandisers. For example, Wal-mart acquired Kuhn's Big K stores. Associated Dry Goods acquired Caldor, and, for the first time, sales of Marshall Field & Co. have been combined in the Batus retail group.

Among the top 25 general merchandise companies, sales last year were $108.4 billion, up 11.5% over 1980. Advertising investment was up 12% to $3.2 billion. A gain of $346 million in advertising increased the ad-to-sales ratio to 2.96%. Over the last nine years, the ad-to-sales ratio has averaged 3.03%.

The leader among the general merchandisers was Sears, which picked up its spending last year after cutting back the year before. Sears' national and local spending was up 17.1% over the year earlier, even though retail sales volume climbed only 7.3% during the same period.

Among the leading supermarket companies, Safeway Stores increased its spending $9 million to $160 million, Kroger Co. also increased its outlay about $9 million to $131 million last year. Lucky Stores' investment was up $5.7 million to $53.5 million.

Sales among the top 25 supermarket companies over-all were up 9.5% over the year earlier to $96.6 billion. Advertising investment was up 9.4% to $977 million last year. The advertising-to-sales ratio dipped to 1.01% last year among these food store operators after three years at the 1.02% level. Over the last nine years, the ratio has averaged 1.12% but has been down five of those years and has never gone up. ■

Louis J. Haugh, managing partner, Westport Marketing Group, Westport, Conn., has been compiling the sales and advertising expenditures of the leading retailers for ADVERTISING AGE for nine years.

Tracking the stats

The information on sales and estimated advertising outlays for the top 50 retail operations in the U.S. was developed by the Westport Marketing Group, Westport, Conn., which mailed a questionnaire to the top 50 companies last year. The responses, plus information from Chain Store Age, Progressive Grocer, Business Week and trade associations, were used in compiling the figures.

General merchandise and supermarket advertising expenditures estimates include newspaper, broadcast, direct mail, catalog, co-op and other promotion media.

Retailers know they belong

The top 50 retailers play a role in the everyday lives of most Americans.

The top 25 general merchandisers operate more than 30,500 stores and the top 25 supermarkets operate more than 18,000 food stores.

However, it is not always possible to tell the corporate parent because some of these companies operate under many different "brand" names. In addition, some general merchandise companies have sizable food store sales and some supermarkets operate general merchandise stores.

In order to tell the local players, here is a scorecard of some of the leading chains.

- The largest, Sears, Roebuck & Co., has only one retail name, although it also operates Allstate Insurance Cos., a full-line insurance company; Dean Witter Reynolds, a brokerage, and Coldwell, Banker & Co., a real estate concern. They make Sears one of the largest financial services organizations in the country.
- K mart operates K mart stores, Kresge, Jupiter and Furr's stores.
- F.W. Woolworth has Woolworth, Woolco, Foot Locker, J. Brannam and Kinney Shoe stores. (Earlier this year Woolworth announced it would sell or close down its Woolco operation.)
- Federated Department Stores' lineup includes Bloomingdale's, Abraham & Strauss, Burdine's, Foley's, Bullock's, Rich's, Gold Circle, Lazarus, Filene's, Sanger Harris, Richway, I. Magnin, Shillito's, Goldsmith's, Pike's, Boston Store, Levy's and Ralphs supermarkets.
- Dayton Hudson operates Target, Mervyn's, Hudson's, Dayton's, B. Dalton, Lechmere and John A. Brown.
- May Department Stores operates Venture, May-California and Cleveland, Hecht, Famous Barr, Kaufmann's, Volume Shoes, Meier & Frank, G. Fox, O'Neill's, Strauss, May D & F and May-Cohen's.
- Carter Hawley Hale operates Broadway, Emporium-Capwell, Neiman-Marcus, John Wanamaker, Waldenbooks, Weinstock's, Thalhimer and Contempo Casual.
- Associated Dry Goods operates Caldor, Lord & Taylor, J.W. Robinson, Joseph Horne, L.S. Ayres, Sibley-Hengerer, Stix, Baer & Fuller, Denver Dry Goods, Hahne, Stewart's, Goldwaters, Pogue's, Robinson's, Powers Dry Goods and Sycamore.
- Allied Stores operates Jordan Marsh, The Bon, Joske's, Maas Bros., Gertz, Pomeroy's, Stern's, Donaldson's, Bonwit Teller, Block's, Reed's, Cain Sloan, Troutman's, Garfinckel, Brooks Bros. and Miller & Rhoads.

ABC-TV among election winners

By DIANE MERMIGAS

Although CBS maintained its prime time ratings lead the fifth week of the 1982-83 season, ABC, which placed third in the 1978 and 1980 election ratings sweepstakes, displaced CBS to lead the pack on election night.

Despite frequent tension and awkward moments between Frank Reynolds and David Brinkley, who shared the anchor desk with Ted Koppel, ABC squeaked past normally top-ranked CBS News on Nov. 2 with a 10.5 rating and 17% share of the national tv audience 7 p.m. to 11 p.m. (ET). CBS averaged a 10 rating and 16 share, followed by NBC with an 8.2 rating and 13 share, according to A.C. Nielsen Co.

It was the first major election coverage anchored by CBS' Dan Rather and NBC's Tom Brokaw and Roger Mudd, a team struggling to establish its credibility in the face of sluggish "Nightly News" ratings. It was Mr. Brinkley's first election involvement at ABC since joining the network last year.

Half-hour trackings election night showed ABC News temporarily lost its national ratings lead to CBS from 8 p.m. to 9 p.m.

However, a different ratings situation prevailed in some big cities. NBC dominated the ratings in New York, averaging three ratings points and four share points over third-ranked CBS. However, CBS led the pack by an even wider margin in Chicago, averaging four ratings points and six share points over third-place ABC in prime-time election coverage.

Many of the independent stations counterprograming movies and other specials election night were the big ratings winners.

However, the networks' collective election night news rating of 32.6 was up 8% over their mid-term election ratings average in November, 1978. Households tuning into network election coverage were up 20% to 27.1 million.

- ABC News was up 46% in rating and 31% in share from its 7 p.m. to 11 p.m. mid-term election coverage in November, 1978, anchored by Barbara Walters and Harry Rea-

Cowles taking control

By ROBERT REED

MINNEAPOLIS—John Cowles Jr. is moving across town, forsaking the gleaming IDS tower that houses the Cowles Media Corp. for the less impressive environs of his Minneapolis Star & Tribune newspaper offices.

The address change has been sparked by three years of internal upheavals—including the layoff of over 1,000 employes—within the venerable newspaper and its parent company.

Last week, the upheavals reached a denouement when Mr. Cowles, president-chief executive officer of the privately held concern, fired longtime Star & Tribune publisher Donald Dwight and took that position upon himself.

Mr. Cowles' grasping of the publisher's reins is a dramatic indication that Cowles Media has reluctantly come to realize that the lifeblood of its corporate well-being centers on the revitalization of the embattled Star & Tribune flagship, say company sources.

Increased attention to the paper also is being viewed as a sign the parent company is backing away from what many

Begins test of Nature Valley beverage line

Gen. Mills jumps on juice wagon

By JANET NEIMAN

The booming beverage business is continuing to attract the major diversified food marketers.

General Mills, which made a brief, unsuccessful venture into soft drinks about six years ago, is attempting to break into beverages again with its first line of fruit juices, now entering Texas market test under the name Nature Valley Fruit-Squeeez.

Described as 100% natural fruit juice blends packaged in shelf-stable aseptic cartons, Fruit-Squeeez comes in five flavors—apple, grapefruit, pineapple, cherry and apricot—but each is a blend of several juices. Both a four-carton pack and one-liter containers are being tested. General Mills "is supplying" the juice itself, a spokeswoman said. The company is said to consider it a major product entry.

The move comes amid the introduction of numerous other juice and beverage products from other food companies, and on the heels of Procter & Gamble's foray into the $2.5 billion fruit juice category with its new Citrus Hill orange juice (AA, Oct. 11), also going into test.

Campbell Soup Co. recently acquired a juice producer and, just before that, its Pepperidge Farm unit began testing apple juice under its brand. Quaker Oats in April acquired Ardmore Farms, the Deland, Fla., foodservice marketer of frozen juices, and there has been speculation that Quaker will move the line into the consumer market.

Purina readies new assault on Quaker

By RICHARD KREISMAN

Ralston Purina Co. appears ready to spend big to challenge competitor Quaker Oats in the premium-price dog food category that Quaker pioneered.

The St. Louis company is rolling out Praise, a dual-textured, combination dry and soft-moist product that will compete with Quaker's Kibbles 'n Bits and Tender Chunks brands. Ralston is telling the trade Praise will get a $30 million introductory push beginning early next year.

Interestingly, Praise is positioned as a premium-price brand at a time when Purina and other pet food marketers have been actively competing with lower-price products; Purina earlier this year relaunched its own Mainstay brand as a low-price entry. (See related story on General Foods' Gaines division, Page 4.)

Even Quaker, which shook up the industry with the higher-priced Tender Chunks brand, has entered the bottom end of the market, selling a complete line of nonbranded pet food to retailers.

The timing of the Praise introduction also coincides with a steady flattening in Kibbles 'n Bits share, and Ralston Purina may be trying to take advantage of a market that has been exposed to a similar product. The Quaker product reached a high share of almost 5% after its $25 million introduction last year. In late September, warehouse withdrawal figures showed the brand with a 2.6% share of the $1.6 billion dry dog food market.

Praise's concept is similar to General Foods' Full Course, a Gas marketing moves to bring credit card fee

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

The major oil companies have made a number of moves in an effort to cut costs in the face of a sluggish market.

Many have lined up behind discount-for-cash programs, some have scrapped their credit card programs, which prompted other companies to accept any oil marketer's plastic. On top of those moves, one company even has returned to a free-gift promotion.

In the end, however, sources say that to achieve cost reductions, oil companies will be forced to make the consumer pay for the use of a gasoline credit card.

"The day of the free oil company card for consumers is almost extinct," said Lester J. Boyle, advertising manager at Tulsa, Okla.-based Getty Refining & Marketing Co. "The way Getty sees it, the probability of oil companies charging the consumer a fee is not that far away," he noted. "When you take the cost of money today, it's easy to see why some companies are already slipping the fee to the consumer."

Chicago-based Amoco, now offering a discount-for-cash program, has completed an eight-month test in which it charged some of its regular customers and heavy commercial clients a $6 fee to use the company's credit card. Seventy-five per cent of the regular charge customers paid the fee, while 85% of the commercial group paid to use the card.

A source at Amoco said the company now is conducting focus groups to determine whether more motorists will pay for the credit card. Amoco carries the largest number of active credit card accounts in the country, about 7 million.

In Michigan, Standard Oil of Ohio has been conducting a test where the company has split its customer base, charging one group $1 per month for use of a Boron credit card and another group a lump sum $12 fee. Sohio's 120 Boron stations were renamed Gas & Go late in 1981, but Boron cards still are honored at these outlets.

In most cases, the tests involve announcements in monthly statements to credit card customers.

ANA considering tv syndication question

By MAURINE CHRISTOPHER

Should the Big 3 tv networks be allowed back into domestic syndication and co-production?

The Assn. of National Advertisers tv committee, which will make recommendations on this $800 million question, still hasn't officially decided whether to support the networks or the syndicators in this crucial power struggle. A policy decision, requiring approval by ANA's board, is expected to be announced at its annual membership meeting this week in Palm Beach, Fla.

The 30-person committee, headed by Harry Way, media director, Colgate-Palmolive, couldn't be more closemouthed. Those willing to talk without attribution come down on opposite sides of the question.

One committee member favored letting the networks compete freely in local distribution and in program production. All parties have until Jan. 26 to file formal comments on the networks' request for repeal of the 1970 rules that permit them to syndicate offnetwork shows abroad but not at home. The rules also limit their financing of Aviance Night Musk will direct the consumer to "Put it on. . .and have an Aviance Night," taking off on the Aviance fragrance theme. Advertising takes off on the movie, "Body Heat."

Longer night Aviance aim

By PAT SLOAN

New York—Prince Matchabelli, the company that first extended its sultry invitations to "Have an Aviance night" seven years ago, will try to seduce the consumer with a new line next spring.

Enter Aviance Night Musk, a line extension—sort of—that is aimed at the fragrance market's musk segment. The segment's estimated $100 million retail business is showing unit growth of about 6% to 7% a year, and thus contrasts sharply with flat unit growth for the over-all fragrance market, according to Michael Horowitz, Prince Matchabelli marketing director.

Other favorable characteristics of the market segment that influenced the Chesebrough-Pond's division to attempt to tap it include a low level of competition and relatively low media support. The principal competitors in the segment are Jovan with a 54% share, Coty with its 24% share and Houbigant's 16% share. In 1979, only $300,000 could be charted in media spending for the musk business; in 1980, the total jumped to $1.3 million, only to dip to $1.1 million last year.

The 1983 total should show a sizable increase, since Prince Matchabelli says it will spend about $1.5 million on Aviance Night Musk's print and tv campaign, via William Esty Co. John Hall, known for

P&G in test with Oasis

By JENNIFER ALTER

Making use of a seemingly apt brand name, Procter & Gamble is testing a new antiperspirant/deodorant called Oasis.

The stick product, testing in the BehaviorScan markets of Eau Claire, Wis., and Pittsfield, Mass., is a "dual action deodorant and antiperspirant system," according to package copy. It consists of a white core of antiperspirant ingredients to protect against wetness, and a green gel outer ring with deodorant ingredients to protect against odor.

Sixty-second tv spots from Benton & Bowles say the product provides "underarm protection in a way you've never gotten it before," and that it makes you "feel clean, feel cool, feel dry and fresh."

P&G, with its two established brands, leads the $1 billion category, but it has lost share since Gillette Co.'s 1978 introduction of Dry Idea.

A revolutionary product when it was introduced, the silicone, rather than water-based Dry Idea was the first antiperspirant to dry immediately upon application. It has

Public tv seeks kiddie show support

WASHINGTON—With a slap at children's fare on the commercial tv networks, a consortium of public tv stations has set out to attract $2 million in backing from corporations and other private groups that want to be associated with a new, high-quality, weekly prime time children's tv series.

The new series, 26 hourlong dramas, is earmarked for prime time beginning in 1984 and designed for 7-to-12-year-olds and their parents. The bulk of the $9 million budget planned for the first season is a $6 million grant from the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, one of the largest chunks of federal aid ever committed by the corporation to a single project.

To get the CPB funds, public tv stations must commit $1 million from their own program budgets to the project. Station program managers will begin considering that commitment this week when they gather here for their annual "program fair." Backers of the new public tv series, in material released here last week, took a swipe at their commercial tv counterparts by quoting New York Times critic John O'Connor as having "flatly" claimed that "the state of children's programing on ABC, CBS and NBC is rapidly becoming a national disgrace."

CPB officials said the new children's series will be coordinated by a new Children's and Family Consortium, made up of public tv stations WQED-TV, Pittsburgh; KCTA-TV, Minneapolis-St. Paul; WETA-TV, Washington; KCET-TV, Los Angeles, and South Carolina Educational Television.

The consortium last week said Lee Polk, New York, former director of children's programing for National Educational Television and ABC, will be executive producer of the new series. Jay Rayvid, senior vp at WQED, will be the executive director of the consortium. It will wade through 194 programing proposals for the series. In describing the series, the consortium said it will "search out and develop stories which present positive role models who speak to the best in us all."

Miniseries as well as single-episode programs, and a mix of original productions and foreign program acquisitions, are envisioned.#

New MCI ad spots get tough on Bell

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

NEW YORK—MCI Communications, looking to get the jump on American Telephone & Telegraph before it enters its heaviest ad spending season, will ring in four new commercials today that are guaranteed to jangle Ma Bell's corporate cool.

The MCI commercials, airing in about 100 markets, not only try to enlist new subscribers before the heavy holiday calling season, they also—as has been the case with most MCI advertising—hit hard at AT&T's time, rate and usage structure.

The most controversial spot in the new Ally & Gargano campaign might be one that is a direct takeoff of an AT&T "reach out" commercial titled, "Joey called" and developed by N W Ayer. The AT&T commercial shows a black couple at their kitchen table, the wife dabbing the tears from her eyes as she tells her husband that their son, Joey, had called just to say he loved her.

The MCI spot also shows a black couple sitting at their kitchen table. With the melodramatic strains of piano and string music in the background, plus the wife's continuous sobbing, the husband asks: "Have you been talking to our son long distance again?"

The woman nods her head yes. "Did he tell you how much he loves you?" the husband asks. "And did he tell you how well he's doing in school? All those things are wonderful, what on earth are you crying for?"

"Have you seen our long-distance bill!" she replies. Voiceover: "If your long-distance bills are too much, call MCI. You'll reach out and touch someone, just for a whole lot less."

Although MCI executives said they expected the spots to create some problems for AT&T "internally," James H. Feeney, senior vp-management supervisor at Ally & Gargano, said MCI attorneys and the agency did not foresee any problems with the sendup. "We took off on a commercial that we think is a good commercial," he said. "We wouldn't want to knock off something that we didn't think was any good."

Another spot asks potential customers to "Take a little jingle out of Bell's pockets. Call MCI."

Timothy C. Cronin, marketing advertising director at Washington-based MCI, said the "jingle" commercial was designed specifically to preempt Bell's own holiday spots. "We're hoping people will sign up for MCI before the heavy [holiday] usage period," he said.

One other spot, which debuted on radio and has been converted for tv, shows a bachelor prowling his apartment while making a phone call. A woman answers. "It's Harold," the bachelor says.

"What time is it?" asks the young woman, who has been awakened.

"Two a.m. your time, sleepyhead," Harold answers. "You won't believe the money I save by calling after 11 p.m.," he says as he slumps on his couch preparing for a long conversation.

"Really," the woman says.

"Fer sure," Harold replies.

"I will save you more money, Harold," she says.

"How, baby?" he asks.

Click. She hangs up on him.#

Say goodbye to double-digit rate hikes

By Robert J. Coen

Media cost trends have continued to rise sharply despite a lingering recession. Advertising has proved to be an excellent marketing tool in a period of high interest rates and accumulating inventories and many media have responded with double-digit rate increases for the third year in a row.

However, the inflation rate for media should eventually come into line with the general inflation rate. The natural forces of the marketplace will bring about this adjustment. Media prices can outpace other prices for just so long and then the pendulum will swing in the other direction, resulting in a great disruption in the media industry.

Some individual media vehicles will be caught in the middle and will not survive the adjustment, so the longer this period of excess lasts, the more severe the consequences of correction will be.

Media cost indexes

For more than two decades McCann-Erickson has tracked unit costs, audience delivery and the changes in costs-per-thousand for the major media. In order to show the data in more understandable terms, all measurements have been converted into indexes.

The year 1967 was chosen as the base because it is the base year frequently used by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the U.S. Department of Labor for its other price indexes.

The media index data have been developed from a number of sources.

The McCann-Erickson annual advertising expenditure reports have been one of the main sources, because the yearly change in expenditures is often a function of the change in the price of time or space, combined with the change in the volume of units purchased. The synthesis of data from different sources is necessary because the actual price charged for an average unit of time or space is not always publicly known.

Each of the major media has experienced a different price trend in the past and each faces a different set of future conditions. These trends and the possible future projections for each medium are as follows:

Media costs

Newspapers

Newspaper advertising rates are now more than three times higher than in 1967, and by next year the unit price index for newspapers is expected to average 335 or 3.35 times the 1967 rate. However steep this rise has been, it still trails three other media—network tv, spot tv and outdoor, which will have index numbers of 405, 339 and 360, respectively, in 1983.

The broadcast and the outdoor media have experienced audience growth in direct proportion to population growth but newspaper circulations have not kept pace with the population.

Thus, we see that newspaper cpms have risen faster than the cpms of all the other major media except network tv, which trails slightly with a 309 mark.

Retailers account for most of the newspaper advertising, and they are experiencing great difficulty in meeting these higher rates. Most retailers are experiencing intense price competition for softening consumer sales and will not pay higher newspaper prices. The result has been a significant decline in newspaper linage in the past year.

Magazines

Until the middle of the 1970s, the index of magazine costs trailed far behind the indexes of the other media because of the decline in demand for magazine space. Magazines were not able to raise their ad rates; instead, they were forced to seek needed revenue from their subscribers and newsstand purchases. Magazine rates began to move upward in the closing years of the decade, but prices this year are only slightly more than twice their 1967 level, while most other media prices have nearly tripled.

The magazine industry has had a price story to tell, but large "catch up" price increases of recent years have apparently turned some buyers away. Many magazines are again finding it difficult to attract the advertising page volume they need to survive with a profit.

In 1983, many of the magazines that have suffered large page volume losses will be concerned about losing more pages if they raise rates and, on the other hand, losing needed ad revenue if they don't. Some marginal publications could get caught making the wrong decision. Moderation in media rates is likely to show up soonest in the magazine industry.

Network tv

Network tv accounts for the largest item in the national advertising budget. Economics of scale make network tv far more efficient than spot tv as a means of forcefully reaching mass markets.

The limited supply of network time results in a supply/demand relationship that frequently favors the seller. Nevertheless, there is a limit to what the traffic will bear.

Whatever the limit is, it does not appear to have been reached in this year.

The medium is expected to post the highest cpm increase of all the major media in 1982—about 12%. Although network tv demand appears quite strong right now, it may have reached its zenith. Buyer resentment to high prices is growing, and demand could begin to slip.

Tv networks have been losing share of viewing at a rate that exceeds most projections based merely on cable tv growth. They are also losing audience to the nonnetwork stations, whose viewers are apparently finding little differences between old movies on the networks and old movies on independent stations. The time table for change in the networks' dominant position may be considerably shortened if the incorrect pricing strategies are followed in the next few years.

NEVER ASK A PLAYBOY TO

Spot tv

The price of tv spots, or nonnetwork tv time, is determined by short-term supply and demand conditions. The underlying base rate in each market is directly related to the size of the market and the national network cpm. Many advertisers honestly believe that recent spot tv price increases in some markets have been obscene. This year, when over-all inflation is declining to between 5% and 6%, and retailers have barely matched last year's sales figures, tv stations in many markets have raised their rates by 10% to 15%. Political advertising, product rebate ads and redirected network funds fueled the demand for local spots, and many stations responded with excessive rate increases.

If spot rates continue to rise faster than the general inflation rate through the next few years, there could be a slide in the other direction for an extended period of time. A significant drop in network tv's dominance would adversely affect the entire price structure of the spot tv medium. A dilution in the short-term special demand conditions that existed this year could also lead to a reversal in the spot tv pricing spiral.

Radio

About 95% of all radio advertising revenues are accounted for by nonnetwork, or spot, time sales. The price of spot radio commercials is dominated by the demand conditions among local advertisers, who account for more than 75% of spot sales. In the last few years the demand at the local level has been generally flat, and in some economically depressed markets, prices have declined.

If you visualized the cpm trends of the major media, the spot radio component would be running lower than all other media in recent years. This year radio ad demand picked up because of the product rebate campaigns and political ads. Unfortunately, many stations responded by raising rates significantly, even though their major customers, the local retailers, are experiencing disastrous business conditions.

Ultimately, radio could benefit by a decline in over-the-air tv audience levels, especially if excess tv pricing continues.

Outdoor

The index of outdoor unit costs is expected to reach 360 by next year. The cost of a 100 showing in a typical market will be 3.6 times as much as it was in 1967. Of course, population has risen since 1967, and the cpm index for 1983 is estimated to reach 280.

Because of the relatively strong demand and limited supply situation, outdoor rates have been pushed upward in many markets at a much faster pace than inflation. The explanation had been that labor and energy expenses necessitated above-average price increases. If this is really true, then prices should remain flat or decline in the near future.

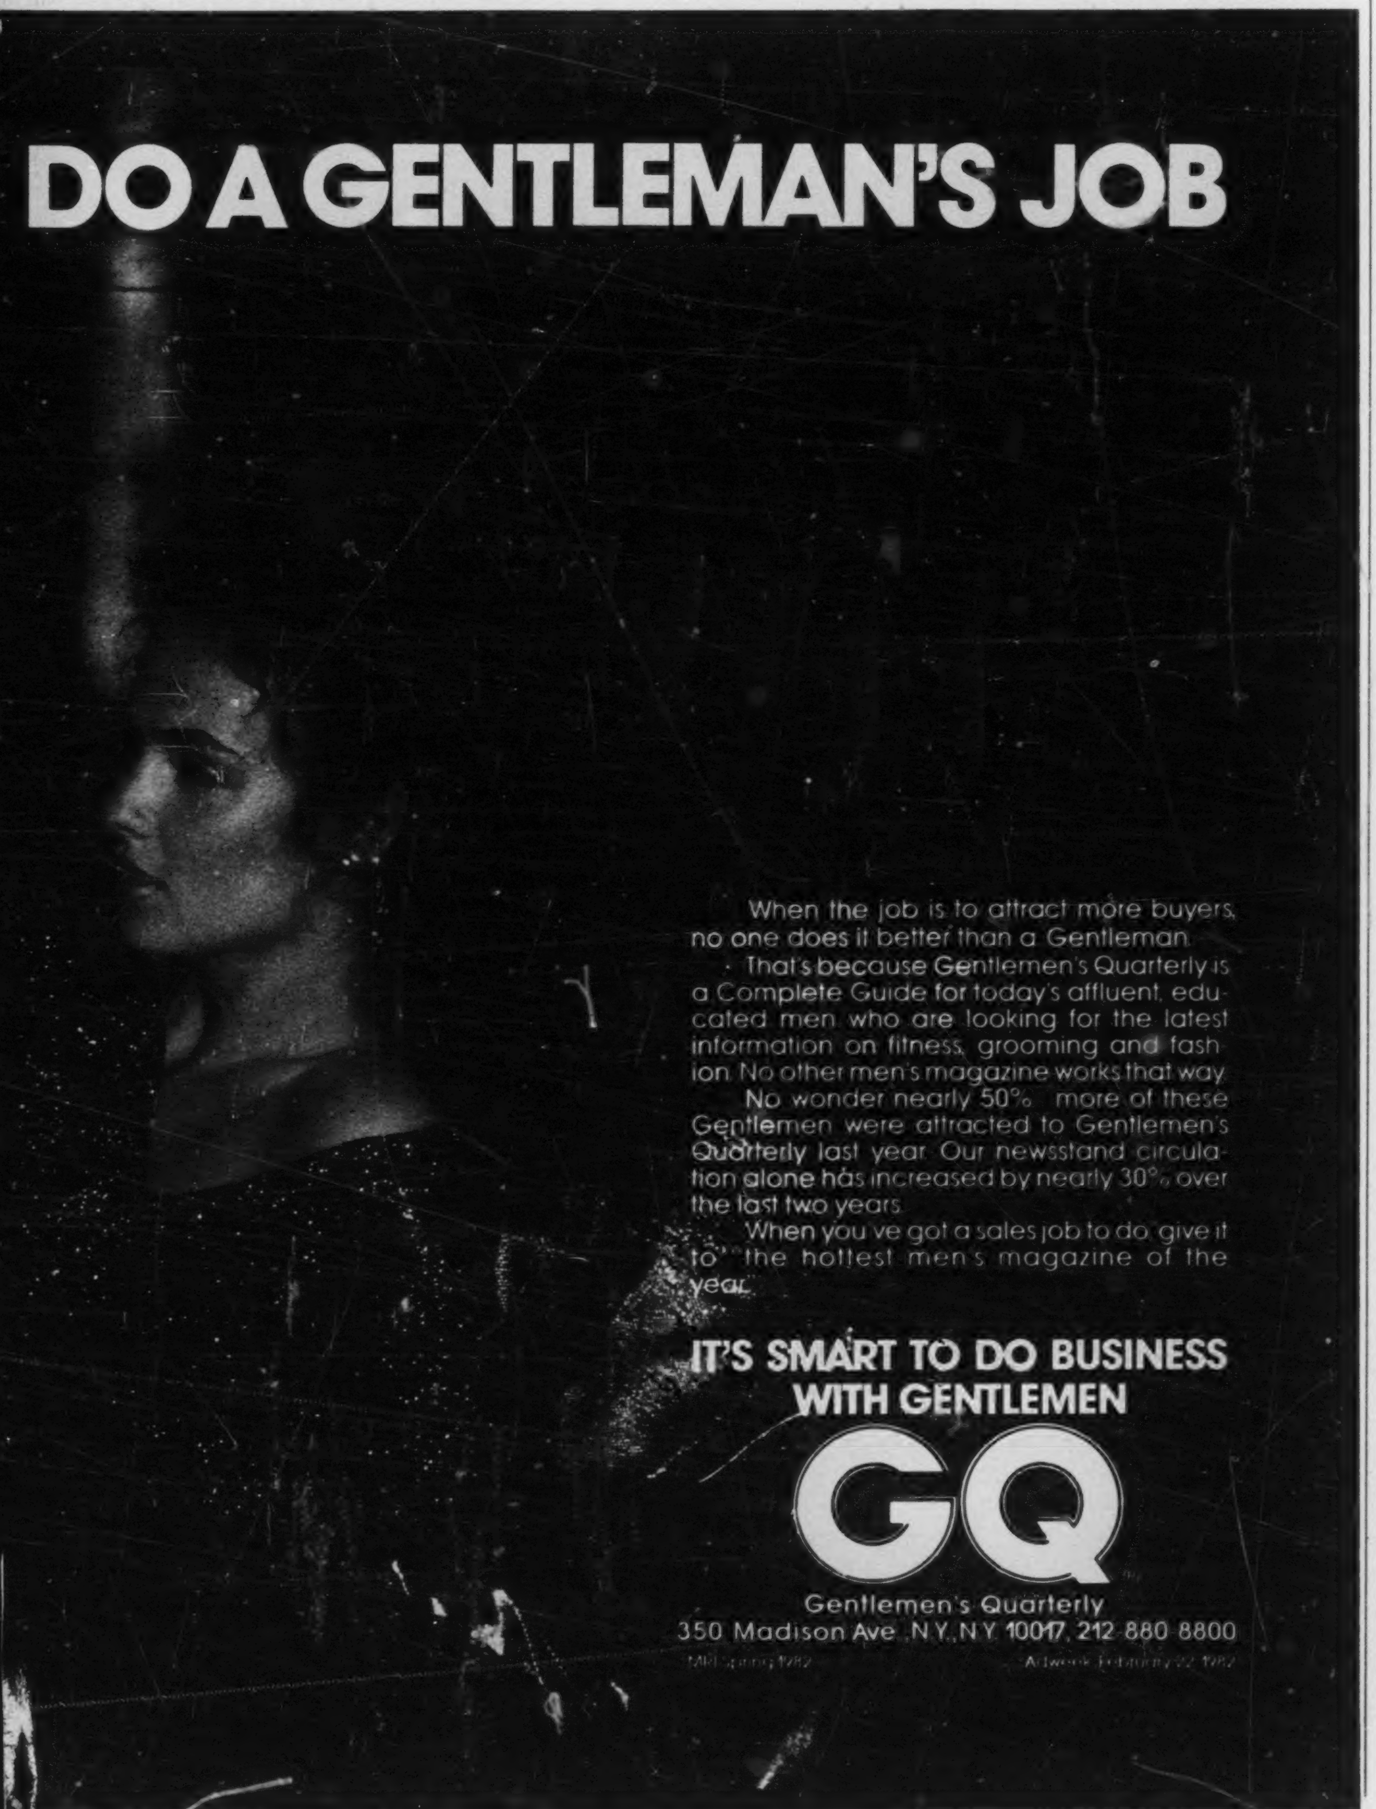
Summary

The pricing trends for each medium differ over the short range, but in general, each has a definite relationship to the general inflationary spiral.

In the first half of the 1970s, advertising unit rates rose slower than inflation, while most media audiences increased. The price of advertising was indeed a bargain when compared with other business costs.

From 1967 to 1980 the price of advertising units and messages rose faster than the general inflation rate, but it still hadn't caught up to the levels of most other costs. Advertising was still a bargain, and the test of the marketplace justified its efficiency as a marketing tool.

In the last few years even greater evidence of advertising's power has emerged, but double-digit media rate increases cannot continue in an economy where general inflation rates are in the 5% to 8% range. ■



DO A GENTLEMAN'S JOB

When the job is to attract more buyers, no one does it better than a Gentleman.

That's because Gentlemen's Quarterly is a Complete Guide for today's affluent, educated men who are looking for the latest information on fitness, grooming and fashion. No other men's magazine works that way.

No wonder nearly 50% more of these Gentlemen were attracted to Gentlemen's Quarterly last year. Our newsstand circulation alone has increased by nearly 30% over the last two years.

Radio: It's no average medium

By J. Fred MacDonald

Contrary to what the Chicken Littles of the broadcasting industry have been warning, the sky is not falling on the radio advertising dollar.

In spite of sizable drops in retailing, stagnant basic industries and record unemployment, industry mavens report favorable signs for the coming year. In fact, according to Natalie Swed, manager of network radio at BBDO, it is precisely during a time of economic retreat that radio becomes an advertiser's most effective investment.

Radio can target an audience and deliver a commercial message with more efficiency than any other medium, she points out. "More than ever before," she says, "clients seeking dollar-stretching opportunities are looking at radio." Based on the current level of business at BBDO, she predicts that "1983 will be a good year."

Kenneth Caffrey, senior vp-executive director of media operations at Ogilvy & Mather, talks about the subjective appeal of the medium. "Radio is personal," he says. "It is an indispensible part of the American life style. It will fit in no matter how we arrange our lives." Mr. Caffrey further notes that although the economy has softened some commitments, radio continues to attract new advertisers. And long-term clients—who could have held back—are still sticking with radio.

According to Miles David, vice-chairman and chief executive officer of the Radio Advertising Bureau, radio ad revenues are continuing to rise. "In 1981, we had a growth of 13.8%, and this year we will realize approximately 10% improvement," he says. "And 1983 will be better than this year. We will have to fight for it, but we will achieve it."

One of radio's major weapons, says Mr. David, is the walk-along radio. Already, 6% of the population owns such receivers, and he foresees that figure reaching 20% to 25% in a few years. More important, he says, these radios are powerful sales devices. They are popular with middle-income consumers; they deliver commercials with greater impact because they wrap the listener in sound, and they stimulate increased listening: Owners of walk-alongs use radio 24% more than they did before purchasing such receivers.

If many in the broadcasting and advertising industries have been fearful of the protracted economic slump, they have been downright terrified by the challenge from the new electronic technologies. In a world of videogames, home computers and videodiscs, those concerned with radio revenues have been especially frightened by the spread of cable tv.

Typically, a May, 1982, report by Ogilvy & Mather referred to cable tv as "the coming storm," an "adversary" with a proven record of "siphoning local advertising dollars away from radio." The report spoke of "cable's threat" and drew parallels between the present situation and the devastation that network radio suffered when video first emerged in the early 1950s.

The O&M report suggested that because of "the coming fight for local advertising dollars," independent stations might consider affiliating with a national network "to counter cable's inroads."

However, the record of cable tv over the past four years does not justify such fright. "The cable threat is coming to a screeching halt," says Louis Severine, vp-director of sales with ABC Radio Networks. "Cable has no national penetration. It cannot justify audiences and many agencies are hesitating to bind their clients to long-term cable commitments."

Where cable has gained high penetration, it has not hurt radio billings. In Tulsa, Okla., some 102,000 customers (250,000 daily viewers) subscribe to one of the nation's most mature cable systems—Tulsa Cable TV. Tulsa Cable delivers 35 television channels and dozens of fm

Right on target

At a time when target marketing increasingly is becoming the favorite local, regional and national strategy, radio remains an effective and popular medium through which to direct commercial messages.

That is the general conclusion of a statistical report issued last month by the Radio Advertising Bureau—the first study in more than 20 years to measure, simultaneously, daily exposure to the four major media.

Entitled "Target Marketing and the Media," the report compares the relative reach and share of media time of radio, tv, newspapers and magazines. It was prepared for the RAB by R.H. Bruskin Associates from a nationwide survey of almost 1,300 respondents at least 12 years of age.

Among the more striking conclusions in the report is that from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., media users spend more time with radio (52%) than with tv (30%), newspapers (12%) or magazines (6%). Indeed, this figure is even higher with certain strategic audiences.

With professional and managerial males, for example, the figure is 64%. It is 60% with fulltime working women and with households earning at least $30,000 annually.

Because of its portability, moreover, radio has a competitive edge over other media in out-of-home usage. More than 85% of all automobile commuters 18 years and older listen to radio, and commuters listen for 92% of their drivetime. Almost 60% of those at least 18 years old report that radio is available at their place of employment. And 84% of those interviewed average almost four hours per day listening on the job.

And because of its ever-present nature, radio reaches consumers closer to time of purchase than any other medium.

Magazines

the wrong areas at the wrong time," says one consultant. "If they had set their sights a little lower, counted less on newsstand and started off a little slower, they would have made it comfortably. They got cold feet because they didn't meet expectations."

Counting too heavily on newsstand sales hurt Washington Post Co.'s Inside Sports as well, according to several analysts. A national competitor to Sports Illustrated, the publication's rate base was calculated on a readership never attained, and there was no backing down on the ad rates when Inside Sports failed to achieve expected readership levels. It was sold.

Ultra, on the other hand, managed to focus in on a defined audience (the rich), in a defined area (the state of Texas) with defined (expensive) tastes. Started in 1981, it already has had up to 97 ad pages an issue.

However, the recent rapid-growth areas of the publishing field—vertical self-interest magazines and those that are of regional special interest—may be close to being saturated. And few categories are primed to take their place, say consultants.

No magazine in the videotechnology field has taken off, for example, despite more and more people buying videocassette recorders. It doesn't seem to be an area, explains magazine consultant Mr. Grossman, that has sparked the same kind of interest as did the stereo field. Many of the sports and recreational fields, he adds, now have their respective magazines and, unless a major and long-lasting new sport is introduced, there may be little room for more of these publications.

"I don't see any new frontiers for either subjects or ways of selling—like grocery store checkout counters represented in the '70s," says Ken Noble, media industry analyst with Paine Webber, New York. "I think the 1980s are going to be a lot more difficult for magazines than the 1970s were. Unless we see a real economic turnaround, there will be a consolidation of the business and no significant expansion in the number of publications."

However, there is one publication that seems close to a sure bet. And it hasn't even appeared. The marketplace has been clamoring for a national publication rounding up cable programing, and the financial rewards for the publisher who successfully creates a TV Guide of the cable industry are potentially staggering.

But Time Inc. is attempting it and is scheduled to introduce TV-Cable Week sometime in 1983. However, many consultants agree that the category of national listings of cable programs has room for only one magazine and probably won't yield a plethora of publications.

So there does seem to be potential for new publications in untapped categories that have a more limited audience.

But advertisers, agreed many agency executives, are still trying to figure out the best way to use the advantages of vertical books. Some, says Cunningham & Walsh's Mr. McDonald, are tailoring ads to individual publications to maximize impact. "We'd rather appear in a lower-circulation magazine twice than a big-numbers publication once," says Bob Spaulding, senior vp-media director of D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius's Bloomfield Hills, Mich., office. "We like numbers sometimes, but we also like to see a quality readership and more affordable rates. That impresses us just as much."

Feisty small paper's moxie shakes 'em up

Philadelphia's Welcomat even takes its advertisers to task

By Jeffrey Heller

To be a part of the newspaper business these days might be a little depressing. Everyone seems to be fighting everyone else, slugging it out with audited circulation figures and readership surveys to compete for readers and advertisers.

However, one of the more refreshing aspects of this particular industry is the innovation and imagination of its devotees. Allen Neuharth and his Gannett's USA Today is one example. But the examples are not always on such a large scale.

In Philadelphia, there is a paper that is trying to break out of its controlled circulation format by combining the charm of a "little" weekly with the impact of a major daily. It is called the Welcomat. And despite its humble origins as a "bulletin board" for center-city residents, Welcomat is emerging as the most lively little paper in town and possibly as a vanguard in the future of big-city publishing.

Early in 1981, Welcomat faced steadily rising costs and stagnant advertising revenues. For 10 years, the paper had been distributed free to center-city homes, apartment houses and office buildings; circulation stood at 31,500 copies.

"We couldn't afford to print more papers and give them away for nothing without increasing ad rates dramatically," says general manager Larry Singer. "And we didn't want to do that." After a rate increase in September, 1981, he says, "we have held firm."

Since that time, Welcomat's staff has taken several decisive steps to increase revenues. Although it is distributed free in the center-city area, it is now also being sold for 25 cents on newsstands in center city and throughout the Delaware Valley. (This area includes southern New Jersey and four neighboring counties in Pennsylvania.) So far, says Larry Singer, newsstand sales have reached only about 1,000 copies. To raise that figure, he's considering the use of radio promotion and newsstand place cards.

Welcomat has also been expanding in size to increase its volume of advertising, rather than concentrating on fewer and more expensive ads. "Last September," says Larry Singer, "we ran a 24-page issue and three 32-pagers; so far this September, we've run a 35, a 48 [second-largest issue ever] and a 44."

This has helped to retain Welcomat's traditional advertisers, including restaurants, small retailers and travel agencies.

With Welcomat's larger size has also come a revamped and cleaner look, thanks to a new, parttime art director. Now, for example, editorial material fills two-thirds of the first four pages instead of just the front page. "The paper has made remarkable forward movement graphically," says Charles Domsky, president of Domsky & Simon Advertising Agency and a longtime advertiser in Welcomat. "There's a level of sophistication in the advertising that separates Welcomat from other neighborhood publications in Philadelphia."

Finally, Welcomat has made critical changes in its editorial content. "In the past," says Larry Singer, "Welcomat ran as close to 70% advertising as it could get; now we're trying to keep it between 60% and 65%." More important, many readers believe the quality of the news articles and features has risen meteorically since editor Dan Rottenberg came on board in late 1981.

"Dan Rottenberg has improved the paper a great deal," says Edwin Guthman, editor of the Philadelphia Inquirer. "He's certainly made it more interesting than a typical throwaway."

A successful free lance journalist and former magazine editor, Mr. Rottenberg was persuaded to become Welcomat's parttime editor because, he says, "my most satisfying experiences have been with little publications."

Mr. Rottenberg is now aided by one fulltime assistant editor. But his budget for free lancers, while somewhat increased, remains minuscule compared with the budgets at the local major dailies. So he attracts writers (and readers) by offering his paper as "a forum where anyone with something intelligent to say can say it. We aim to stimulate ongoing discussion, instead of trying to make every article a definitive truth. Reading Welcomat is like having a bunch of intelligent people in your living room, arguing with each other and sharing ideas."

Dan Rottenberg glances up from the product he has helped transform. It is now, he says, "a forum where anyone with something intelligent to say can say it."

radio stations. But radio advertising revenues have not been adversely affected.

At KRAV-FM and KGTO, for example, time sales totals are up 40% over last year. "Cable tv has not affected our sales one iota," says John Hurt, assistant general manager of the outlets. "Certainly, we have had to work harder, hire better people and offer better services to our clients, but in four years of worrying about cable, I can't think of one account we ever lost or had to split because of cable."

One service that might confront local radio most directly is the delivery of fm radio via cable. For an extra fee subscribers of Tulsa Cable can receive through their stereo radios three Dallas stations, one from Fort Worth, a Chicago fine arts station, the audio from Music Television, Home Box Office and Cinemax, as well as several local stations and an inhouse musical outlet. Nevertheless, fewer than 6% of Tulsa Cable customers have requested this service.

Although the anxiety over cable tv is understandable, it is too simplistic to focus only on the competition between radio and cable for ad dollars. Radio has found a niche in American society that cable cannot destroy.

Because 60% of radio usage comes out of the home—especially in the morning and afternoon drivetimes—cable cannot dent this major portion of radio's appeal. The targeting, frequency and penetration offered by radio are not matched by cable. And in this time of great turnarounds in the marketplace—from sudden price changes to competitive promotions—radio offers advertisers a rapid reaction time not matched in any form of video.

The real struggle is for time on the tube. Cable's chief rival is conventional tv, not radio.

That cable tv has not diminished the appeal of radio is demonstrated in a report, "Target Marketing and the Media," issued last month by the Radio Advertising Bureau. The report, conducted in the spring of 1982 by New York-based R.H. Bruskin Associates, substantiates the continued popularity of radio with Americans. In the national audience of people 12 years of age and over, 46% of the "time using media" is spent with tv; the figure for radio is 39%. The total for newspapers is 10% and for magazines 5%. Even more significant, in certain prime audiences, radio outranked tv. With those in families making more than $30,000 annually, radio was 44% and video was 36%. And among fulltime working women, the figures were 44% for radio and 41% for tv.

Despite highly publicized failures, network radio is also on the upswing for 1983. The recent scuttling of ABC's Super Radio network before it was launched was not the result of advertiser reluctance. Instead, according to one industry leader, network fees were too high and the affiliates rejected the project.

There are, however, 17 networks currently operating. More are expected next year. These networks consist of packages of news, sports, talk, music and other features supplied to affiliates with specific audiences in mind. Thus, NBC's "The Source" is for adult contemporary music stations, and ABC's "Directions," with its news and interviews features, is for stations attracting older audiences.

At ABC, with its six networks servicing 2,000 stations via satellite transmission, the future is bright for 1983. For Louis Severine, it is the upfront money from advertisers that is important. "Upfront dollars cover 50% to 55% of our revenues for the broadcasting year," he says, "and we are beginning to approach that figure for 1983."

The bottom line on advertising on radio, he says, is that "advertisers like it, there is no spillover, no waste." ■

Ad budgets 'hanging in' in '83

Palm Beach—Presumably out of fear of being burned—from either side—major marketers are planning modest increases in ad budgets for 1983.

Still stinging from lessons learned when they clipped spending during the last recession, yet too uncertain of the economy to really let loose with funds, marketers surveyed at the Assn. of National Advertisers annual meeting here expect expenditures to hold steady, possibly at the rate of or slightly faster than inflation.

The sentiment of most marketers contacted in an informal Advertising Age survey was captured in a comment by Robert E. Haynes, director of creative services for General Foods: Spending will be stable, he said, "we're hanging in there pretty well."

Although for the most part advertiser interest in cable is not yet cutting into budgets traditionally allocated to the mass media, it is clear the new technology is being taken very, very seriously. Nearly every company contacted said it has been dabbling in the medium.

For example, George (Pete) Tyrrell, vp-advertising, corporate staff, Johnson & Johnson, stated that although his company's involvement in cable tv may have started out as token, "it's not token anymore."

While Kraft Inc.'s network spending will "probably be about the same," said James Blocki, vp-director of advertising and creative services, retail food group, and the cable budget will remain "supplementary," the company will continue to experiment with cable. To date, Kraft has developed special ad-

FCC issue kept under wraps

ANA plans to oppose nets' syndication

Palm Beach—The three major tv networks' concerted bid to get back into the lucrative $800 million-plus domestic syndication and co-production business was dealt a potentially severe blow here by the Assn. of National Advertisers' tv committee.

Despite strenuous efforts on the part of ANA officials to keep the committee's recommendation under wraps, word leaked out at the organization's annual meeting that it favors keeping the networks frozen out—in other words, it is for retention of the Federal Communications Commission's financial interest and syndication rule, the regulation that bars ABC, CBS and NBC from participation in program syndication in the U.S.

In the early days of the meeting, ANA was treating the issue with extreme sensitivity. It did not enter open discussion until the last day, during a panel session that included NBC chairman Grant Tinker and Motion Picture Assn. of America president Jack Valenti.

Although the matter still must be voted upon by the ANA board at a meeting Jan. 13 to 14 in New York, the committee's action should elate the Committee for Prudent Deregulation, comprised of syndicators, producers and independent stations.

It is believed the newly expanded board did approve in principle the panel's position, in preparation for the final decision in January. The advertisers' stand opposing repeal becomes even more significant if, as expected, the ANA decides to file formal comments with FCC; its tv committee is understood to be urging a strong lobbying effort against repeal. All parties have until Jan. 26 to file such comments on the networks' request to repeal the 1970 rules that permit them to syndicate shows abroad but not at home. The rules also limit their co-financing of the programing made here for their own airing.

According to a source, a majority of the 30-member tv committee, headed by Harry Way, media

Card-activated system, ATMs studied

Automated gas pumps?

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

The major oil companies are seriously studying the possibility of moving to credit card-activated gasoline pumps that not only could radically change their retail operations, but lead to a linkage with shared automated teller machine networks across the country.

The primary concerns of oil company execs pondering the shift centers on consumer acceptance, the cost of the systems and whether the systems should be activated by their own credit cards, a bank's debit card or some type of combination card.

Even without the participation of the shared ATM networks, oil company execs believe that the card-activated systems could cut the cost of handling credit, reduce fraud and bad debts and lower processing costs.

"We've had discussions with many of the major oil companies concerning how they are going to interface with electronics and no one is really taking any definitive directions," said John Russell, vp-marketing director for Banc One Corp., Columbus, O.

A senior exec at a Texas-based bank, who declined to be identified because his institution is talking with oil companies interested in linking a bank network and a card-activated system, was more positive.

"Every one of the oil companies is positioning itself" for card-activated systems, he said. "What they are doing now is trying to determine what banks and what people are going to run those systems for them and what type of card they want to accept."

When these card-activated systems will appear broadly on the market also is a matter of debate. Some bank execs predict they will be seen by mid-1983, while oil company execs say anywhere from two to 10 years. Industry analysts have said that within three to five years self-service pumps will be the primary source of gasoline sales in the U.S. Half of those sales, they say, could be activated by either the credit or debit card.

Movie Channel sale perils HBO pay lead

By SUSAN SPILLMAN

NEW YORK—Three major motion picture companies that have been attempting to break Home Box Office's stronghold on the pay tv industry finally positioned themselves for such an assault last week. They purchased equity in The Movie Channel, the cable network jointly owned by American Express and Warner Communications.

After several months of on-and-off negotiations, MCA-Universal, Paramount Pictures Corp. and Warner Bros. shelved their corporate egos long enough to reach an agreement under which each will purchase an equal portion of the third-largest pay tv network. American Express will maintain what is presumed to be a lesser portion of the 2-year-old cable service. The new partners stated that The Movie Channel's present management would remain.

For the past several years Home Box Office, by virtue of its sheer size, has been able to get Hollywood to sell it films at prices that studio executives consider to be ridiculously low. But because HBO's subscribers account for about 60% of the total pay tv audience, not to sell to that network would have meant greater losses.

And studios now need pay tv to make up more of their revenues. The exposure of films on pay tv has prompted the broadcast networks to cut back on the number of movies they buy each year as well as the prices they pay for such fare.

The Movie Channel's new partners each plan to license their motion pictures to The Movie Channel on a nonexclusive basis. Each title also will be made available to all other pay tv services. Nonetheless, The Movie Channel could well wind up being the sole pay tv exhibitor of those studios' wares. According to Anthony Hoffman, entertainment analyst for A.G. Becker, the partners will sell their films to The Movie Channel at prices too high to be attractive to rival networks. This will enable them to get their desired film prices. And while the plan initially will impact The Movie Channel with greater losses, it is expected to eventually turn a heavy profit as its de facto exclusive product amasses it greater numbers of subscribers.

More than 1,000 reporters in 30 cities attended a closed-circuit press conference by Johnson & Johnson to introduce new packaging for Tylenol. Scene above is in Chicago's Palmer House, where some 100 press representatives gathered. New Tylenol packaging (left) will include (1) glued flaps on box, (2) plastic neck seal and (3) inner foil seal, plus warning about broken seals.

New Tylenol package in national press debut

By NANCY GIGES

NEW YORK—In the next step of its carefully calculated, seemingly faultless Tylenol rehabilitation program, Johnson & Johnson chairman James E. Burke told of plans to have Tylenol capsules back on the market within a matter of weeks in a triple safety-sealed, tamper-resistant package.

He and other company execs unveiled the new package and other plans for the product at an unprecedented national press briefing via closed-circuit video. The telecast originated here and was carried live by satellite-tv transmission to more than 1,000 media representatives in 30 cities. After Mr. Burke's prepared remarks, reporters in five locations, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Chicago and Los Angeles, were able to ask questions that were telecast throughout the closed-circuit system.

J&J and its McNeil Consumer Products Co. subsidiary's plans include:

- Newspaper ads running Nov. 21, Nov. 28 and again in December offering consumers a $2.50 coupon for any Tylenol product to replace any product they may have discarded. Consumers also may receive the coupon by calling a toll-free number.
- Completion of distribution of newly packaged capsules by year's end. The protection includes glued flaps on the outer box, a tight plastic neck seal and an inner foil seal over the mouth of the bottle. In addition, a bright yellow warning label reads, "Do not use if safety seals are broken."
- A "continue to trust Tylenol"-type ad campaign due to break before year's end. It will be similar to the earlier commercials featuring McNeil Consumer Products Co. medical director Tom Gates (AA, Oct. 25). Choice of a spokesman has not been completed, but it is expected to be someone from within the company. Compton Advertising will handle.
- Resumption of product-oriented advertising early next year.
- Probable repackaging of many J&J consumer products, including toiletries, in tamper-resistant containers.
- Meeting with Chicago Mayor Jane Byrne early this week to persuade her to lift the total ban on the sale of Tylenol products in that city. Seven people in Chicago and its suburbs died after taking Tylenol contaminated with cyanide.

Asked whether the company had considered at any point marketing the product under another name, Mr. Burke said although management looked at all options, there was never any intention other than to rebuild the brand. Surveys in the past five weeks have further convinced the company that there is a core of loyal users who want the product in capsule as well as tablet form. He suggested that to introduce the product under another name could very well be misleading anyway.

ABC joins shuffle of tv lineups

By JAMES P. FORKAN

NEW YORK—ABC and NBC programers vowed to "stay the course" last week in the wake of CBS' decision to annul three Wednesday night series.

But late Friday ABC made its first fall season fix, slating a Friday movie package for a Dec. 3 premiere. "Greatest American Hero" and "The Quest" will have their last telecast on Nov. 19 before going "on hiatus." (The Larry Holmes fight is due Nov. 26.)

CBS' doctoring of its prime time schedule, the first of the new season, hit its three lowest-rated series in the six-week season, "Alice," "Filthy Rich" and "Tucker's Witch," in the 19 to 21 audience share area. Although speculation began immediately that those three shows were dead, Harvey Shephard, CBS Entertainment senior vp, emphasized all three will return "later this season."

Some felt that two of the three might well run off the remainder of their episodes in the spring and summer, that being a more attractive alternative than CBS having to shelve them, unplayed.

As if to confirm such speculation, CBS announced late last week

Agencies' 3rd period still low

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

NEW YORK—Looking at the advertising industry's third quarter, Steve Slawson, an analyst at Bears, Stearns & Co., found the numbers "all lower than expected."

Fred Anschel at Dean Witter Reynolds agreed, adding that the results were "generally disappointing. The recession turned out to be a lot worse than expected."

In the third quarter of '82, the biggest loser in net income was Doyle Dane Bernbach, off by a whopping 269% to a minus-$1.4 million from a profit of $856,000 in the same quarter of 1981. The agency attributes its losses to the devaluation of the Mexican peso and a sharp decline in recruitment advertising spending.

Many agencies were affected by "the terrible level of business in the recruitment agencies that they all bought back in 1979," Mr. Anschel said. "In fact, they are all losing money. Now they've scaled back the operations as far as they can and [are] waiting for the business to pick up again. It will, eventually."

Interpublic chairman Philip Geier attributed the 11.9% net income decline to losses from certain foreign operations that were not tax deductible. Also, in the third quarter of 1981, Interpublic picked up a one-time $2.5 million tax credit (concerning inventory relief) in the United Kingdom.

For every loser, there seems to be a winner, however, and Mickelberry Corp., the industry maverick that buys agencies for their profit potential, came out the leader in every category. Mickelberry's holdings include Cunningham & Walsh, Nadler & Larimer and Laurence, Charles & Free. After a hot buying binge in 1982 that included C&W, and after deep-sixing its money-losers, Mickelberry's third-quarter net was up 1,477% to $458,000.

Despite sustaining a pretax loss of $669,000 in the third quarter, JWT Group's net income was up 58% (as a result of various tax credits) to $3 million.

Revenues were up in the third quarter for all the agencies, with Mickelberry showing the largest increase, 163% to $19.5 million.

For the first nine months of '82, net incomes reflect the feeling that 1982 has been the sort of year most agency chief execs would just as soon forget. While Mickelberry's net was up 87% to $1.2 million, only Interpublic (up 43.6% to $12.7 million) and BBDO (up 14% to $9.4 million) showed solid gains.

Still reeling from the scandals of its syndication unit, JWT's net for the period was down 82% to $816,000 as compared to $4.6 million net income posted a year ago. The results reflect a $12.1 million writeoff the company took as a result of accounting irregularities in the syndication unit last winter.

In terms of revenues for the first nine months of 1982, Mickelberry's shops were up 110% to $49.5 million for the quarter. Grey posted gains of 26% to $101.9 million, while Interpublic's armory of agencies increased worldwide revenues by 21.3% to $379.3 million. According to Mr. Geier, the new business netted in the first nine months of 1982 neared $251 million, a record gain for three quarters.

Looking forward to the fourth quarter, Mr. Anschel said, "It should not be too bad, except for the same considerations. The basic advertising business really hasn't been too bad, unless there were account losses. There have been some cutbacks but they haven't been that terrible. The thing that is really killing them is problems abroad."

And next year? "I look for at least modest gains," Mr. Anschel optimistically added.#

With data, if you've got them, flaunt them

By Sarah Stiansen

Sure there's gold in cable advertising. The problem has been convincing the advertisers it's there, and how to find it.

But there are lots of entrepreneurs trying to come up with the winning ticket for striking it rich in cable—reliable audience assessment. The cable advertising market is expected to reach $225 million this year, compared with $5.6 billion in network tv, yet it still isn't enough to justify the more than two dozen ad-supported systems.

Of the four generic methods for measuring a broadcast audience—meters, diaries, recall telephone interviews and telephone coincidentals, when the viewer is simply asked what he or she is watching—each has its own set of problems and biases. Between cost effectiveness and credibility, the problems are compounded for measuring cable.

For one thing, there's the overwhelmed viewer to consider—one who isn't responding to tv the same way anymore.

But there has been a stampede into the research arena, with new and old organizations polishing up their cable techniques and producing what some see as informative and reliable data.

CAMS (Magazine, May 24), or Cable Advertising Methodology Study, is being conducted under the auspices of CAB/NCTA Research Standards Committee—Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau in New York, and the National Cable Television Assn. in Washington. According to Bruce Hoban, vp-director of research at Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau, it's the first good look taken at procedures used for cable ratings.

CAMS is due out early next year, and industry observers are awaiting it eagerly. The study's sponsors include heavyweights ABC-Video, Entertainment & Sports Programming Network, Group W Satellite, USA Cable, WarnerAmex and Cox Communications.

CAMS is testing seven methods—four diary, three telephone—against random phone interviews within the sample to determine which are most accurate. According to Mr. Hoban, up to now "research has assumed that measuring cable households is just like measuring noncable households, and the goal of the study is to establish statistically sound and affordable procedures."

But while CAMS is generally recognized in the industry as an important step in the documentation of cable audiences, not everyone has been waiting around for its appearance.

Bill Harvey, chairman of NEMS Inc., or New Electronic Media Sciences, said his company—a consortium of several research companies—is also grappling with the best and most affordable methods for cable ratings. According to Mr. Harvey, metering, the method used by Nielsen and Arbitron, will not be economically possible for large cable studies in this decade, and diary responses understate ratings.

Mr. Harvey, designer of the current model Arbitron tv and radio reports, inventor of Arbitron's Areas of Dominant Influence in 1966 and former chief analyst and co-designer of the Arbitron/VideoProbeIndex New Electronic Media Study, said the best method is coincidental phone calls. A simple one-minute conversation can produce a 90% cooperation rate. But this can be as expensive as metering, so Mr. Harvey wants to find a way to use Computafone—a patented system of computer-conducted telephone surveys—as a cheap alternative. (The system uses recorded interviews, asking viewers to respond by pressing certain digits on their phone.)

But this method too may have its pitfalls, according to Mr. Hoban. There is still a lot of investigation to be done into biases that may affect cable viewers' responses in phone interviews—as determined by whether they speak to a person or to a computer.

NEMS Inc. also publishes "Media Science Newsletter," widely subscribed to by large agencies, advertisers and cable companies, including ABC, American Express, Viacom, WarnerAmex, J. Walter Thompson, Young & Rubicam, ESPN and PepsiCo. It covers a range of topics, as well as recommendations for cable research. At this point, the company does not issue syndicated reports on cable viewing.

Meanwhile, the undisputed kingpins of audience research, A.C. Nielsen and Arbitron, have not been idle. Nielsen's main activity in research is its participation in the CAMS project.

For two weeks in June, Arbitron tested four methods of measuring viewer response in a single system, said David Lapovsky, director of research at Arbitron. The study compared a two-way cable system with Arbitron's standard diary and telephone surveys. Arbitron also provided viewers with a specially designed cable diary, including a roster of cable channels available in the test market to help them record viewing correctly.

Although Mr. Lapovsky would not name Arbitron's test market, he expects "we'll have something to say by June, 1983." When asked about the difference between Arbitron's recent attempts and the CAMS study, he emphasized Arbitron's interest in the broader tv research picture: "Our goal is not to test a measurement. It's to help us capture all usage of television."

Nielsen is also adjusting its methodology. A company spokesman said that Nielsen has added 100 houses to its 1,300 metered homes nationwide, and it is making plans to increase that sample size to 2,000. This is the first major change in Nielsen methodology in 30 years, and is designed to improve Nielsen's coverage of cable systems. Starting this month, the company is providing, on a quarterly sweep basis, market-by-market cable audience reports.

Another company expecting some superior results from a specialized diary is Beaufort, N.C.-based Marquest Media Services. Paul Rule, who was manager of marketing research services at Arbitron for four years and is currently president of Marquest, said the company plans to market syndicated local analysis reports similar to Nielsen reports or Arbitron Cable Advertising Market Profiles.

Advertising motivation of clients

Source: McKinsey & Co.

Founded this year, the company takes a sample from the market's core, phones households and records viewer descriptions of services received. The company then prints a personalized roster, listing only those channels the viewer subscribes to. The roster is included in the diaries, giving "lesser known channels an equal chance of being remembered," said Mr. Rule.

The first Marquest test study was conducted this spring in the Buffalo/Niagara Falls, N.Y. area, and the first "live" reports are expected to be available this fall in San Francisco/Oakland/San Jose; Hartford/New Haven/New Britain, Conn.; Tulsa, Okla.; Boise, Ida., and Tyler, Tex.

The reports will provide gross ratings for systems within those markets. Mr. Rule claimed that "the [test] diaries performed beautifully," and although he would not name his clients, said the response has been substantial thus far.

Marquest is also different in its approach to sample areas. Mr. Rule believes, along with Mr. Hoban of the cable bureau, that a lack of established procedures in cable research has often stemmed from treating cable as just another broadcast medium.

"This is really a different geographical market—it's not a signal sent out over the air," he said. "It's not an ADI. It's an area defined by franchises and interconnects. The geography is more like that of newspapers. The advertiser can stop his message at the county line."

Another company that has been successful in selling its cable research is Statistical Research Inc. (SRI), a Westfield, N.J.-based market research company, which has produced network radio assessments since 1972. Recently, SRI released its first nonproprietary cable study.

Gale Metzger, president of SRI, said the report is "not an audience study," but focuses on what he called the "whys of cable . . . to provide information about where cable is going."

The study, like Marquest's, focused on viewing patterns of cable households only. Using responses to phone interviews, the study answers questions about cable users' expectations of their services, cost and perceived value, services not subscribed to, ad-supported services viewed and reactions to commercials. Mr. Metzger said "18 of the top 20 agencies" have picked it up.

An equally strong claim to success is made by Chicago's Information Resources Inc. (IRI). Operating a system dubbed BehaviorScan, the company provides information about the effect of cable ads on consumers. According to Gerry Eskin, vice-chairman of IRI, "80% to 90% of the Fortune 500's food and drug manufacturers are our clients."

Because IRI knows what ads were aired while test sets were tuned to particular channels, correlations between ads viewed and products purchased can be tallied.

The distinction between what a viewer sees and what a viewer pays attention to is also the compelling premise behind the research of a Cambridge, Mass.-based research company, Television Audience Assessments (TAA).

A nonprofit company that began in 1980, TAA expects to release a study entitled "Viewing Television: Audience Response" in December or January. Sponsors include Home Box Office, USA Network, Group W, ESPN and WarnerAmex. The bygone CBS Cable was also an original sponsor, and Elizabeth Roberts, president of TAA, said that the parent company, CBS Inc., has continued to contribute to the project.

Traditional ratings, she said, can be misleading, and so the TAA report has been designed to complement gross ratings, which she is convinced will always be important in selling ads. By providing a diary to viewers and asking that it be submitted every day, the report has uncovered some interesting facts about users in today's "multichannel environment."

A preliminary report, released in October, shows some of the ways in which "viewers are changing . . . which programs they pay attention to, which they value," she said. And that information may surprise advertisers who base their tv buys on gross ratings.

The study has confronted a suspicion of some advertisers—even if viewer sets are left on all evening, they may just be ignored. In many households, a tv is little more than a "talking lamp," Ms. Roberts said. When TAA phoned its preliminary cable sample, only 14% of viewers were watching either a pay or nonnetwork service. That kind of documentation may cure lots of media buyers' headaches and create some for cable companies themselves.

European market a tougher grind, Wendy's learns

By JASPER BECKER

BRUSSELS—The race to gain shares of the fast-food market in Europe, long a bonanza for U.S. marketers, is getting tougher, and the latest victim is Wendy's International.

Wendy's is shutting down its five outlets in Belgium, after less than three years in the market, because its U.S. partner, J.C. Penney, decided the outlets were not meeting a "hurdle rate," or set of financial criteria, according to Edward Lifmann, international managing director for Wendy's.

He said there are no plans to re-enter the market. "The impact of this is very limited," said Mr. Lifmann. The Belgian market will be worth about $60 million by 1987, according to sources..

This setback comes on the heels of the huge, Swiss-based Wienerwald group going into receivership in August, and a slowdown in plans of other fast-food marketers to expand in Britain because of lack of main street sites.

As for Penney, it took on the Wendy's franchise to compete against rival retailers and because "we have a similar, high-quality product and concept," says Bernard Gerson, manager of finance and administration at Penney's European headquarters.

But when poor results started coming in while the cost incurred in getting out was still small, Penney's made its move. Penney's only European retail operation is in Belgium, where it is the country's second-largest retailer. But because of depressed European economies it has closed seven stores since the beginning of the year and is holding off on plans to expand throughout Europe.

Mr. Lifmann says the combination of a devaluation of the currency and a price freeze that prevented Wendy's from recouping cost increases largely caused the poor results in Belgium.

Using Dancer Fitzgerald Sample's agency in Belgium, DFS/McCredie, Wendy's positioned itself several different ways in an attempt to find the right formula. Initial campaigns from New York showed the "bigger, juicier" Wendy's burger, but "there was not the same appreciation for better food and pleasanter ambiance because the Belgian fast-food market is still essentially restricted to teen agers," said Mr. Gerson.

Last July Wendy's cut prices, reduced the burger size and redecorated its restaurants. But nothing, not even 15,000 free coupons, could cut into the lead of McDonald's over a local chain, GB-Quick. In retaliation, McDonald's also cut its prices.

In the rest of Europe, Wendy's has had some rocky beginnings. In 1980, John Rollo quit as chief of European marketing for Wendy's and went back to Burger King. Just this August, George McKeown was appointed new European marketing coordinator.

Wendy's has also gone through different partners. In the U.K., it started out with Grand Metropolitan's Berni Inns subsidiary, but Grand Met pulled out of the deal in December, 1980, two weeks after the first outlet opened on Oxford Street. Grand Met now has its own fast-food chain—Huckleberrys.

In Germany, Wendy's has a joint-venture agreement with $1.25 billion baking powder and food giant, Dr. Oetker, for most of Wendy's 14 restaurants. Six more restaurants are on the drawing boards.

Wendy's targeting the upper end of the fast-food consumer market has worked better in some places than others. In Switzerland, Wendy's has 10 shops and plans to add 10 more starting in mid-1983. After a slow start in which "we tried to follow the U.S. a little too much when we started, but now we've gone back to basics," says Bob Nugent, managing director of Weneco, Wendy's Geneva-based holding company, the company is now growing 20% a year in sales.

To counter criticisms that the marketer does not "localize" its marketing the way McDonald's, for example, does, Rainer Geffcken, account director for McCann-Erickson, which handles Wendy's in Switzerland, points out that the U.S. tag line, "hot and juicy," was changed because it doesn't translate well in French. So in French-speaking Switzerland, McCann has rendered the line Tout bon, tout grand, or "real good and real big." In the German-speaking part, it is Gross und saftig, or "big and juicy."

In Spain, Wendy's ranks second to Burger King, with McDonald's a distant third, largely because it has targeted consumers between 14 and 24 years old who make up 80% of the fast-food market. Wendy's has six outlets in Spain and plans another three next year.#

Sports, leisure equipment top ad spending

NEW YORK—Sporting and leisure-time equipment showed the largest percentage gain in newspaper advertising spending for August, a month in which nine of 16 measured categories registered increases, according to the figures from Media Records.

Ad spending for sporting and leisure-time equipment was up 342% to $754,000, followed by cosmetics, makeup and manicure products, up 134% to $254,000, and radio, tv, phonographs and records, up 21% to $8.1 million.

Coffee and tea recorded the greatest percentage drop for the month, down 65% to $96,000, while airlines were down 10% to $4.7 million, and soft drink beverages were down 10% to $236,000.

Albuquerque paper starts

ALBUQUERQUE—The first edition of the New Mexico Sun, a semiweekly newspaper, debuted here Nov. 7.

Initially, the tabloid/broadsheet newspaper is being distributed free to 100,000 area residents. Within several weeks, the newspaper plans to begin conversion to paid subscription.

The New Mexico Sun is a property of Meredith Corp., Des Moines.

Didier Raven, former ad director of the Santa Fe Reporter, is publisher of the new paper and Martin Gerber, former managing editor of the Herald, Everett, Wash., is editor.

"Albuquerque needs another newspaper," Mr. Raven said. "In a market area of 162,000 households, the Albuquerque Journal and the Tribune don't have a combined penetration of 50% of the homes, so there's plenty of room for us out there."

The Journal's morning home delivery now is going to 31.1% of the market, while the Tribune's afternoon delivery has a penetration of 14.6%, making a combined market penetration of 45.1%, according to Mr. Raven.

The news sections of the Sun are printed tabloid size. Page ads in that section sell for $1,800.

Page ads in the inserted broadsheet sections of the newspaper cost $900.

Promotion for the Sun is being handled by Rick Johnson & Co., and includes tv, radio and outdoor.#

P&G to nets: Help cut costs

By CRAIG REISS

New York—Top-level executives of the three broadcast networks, responding to a written request from the head of their single biggest advertiser, Procter & Gamble, have held face-to-face discussions with the Cincinnati marketer's top management on the future cost-effectiveness of network tv.

The meetings with the P&G executives, which followed this year's record upfront market rate increases, gave all parties a chance to explain their positions and to hammer out ways the networks and P&G could work together to hold the line on network costs for the next five to 10 years.

For the first time ever, P&G's president-chief executive officer John Smale, accompanied by vp-advertising Robert Goldstein and other key advertising and marketing executives, visited network offices here for discussions. The P&G contingent met one morning with CBS executives, including James Rosenfield, exec vp, CBS Broadcast Group; at noon with NBC's chairman-chief executive officer Grant Tinker, president Robert Mulholland, group exec vp Ray Timothy and vice-chairman Irwin Segelstein, and in the afternoon with ABC chairman-ceo Leonard Goldenson, exec vp Frederick Pierce, network president James Duffy, president John Severino of the ABC Television division and network sales chief Jake Keever.

According to network sources, Mr. Smale and his associates did not attempt to influence current ad rates set by the nets. Instead, the sources said, Mr. Smale asked the networks to work with the company to develop cooperative means for keeping network overhead manageable and advertising prices cost-efficient and viable for P&G,

Harried but hopeful nets sell NFL again

By JAMES P. FORKAN

New York—After weeks of making-do with substitute programing and make-goods for National Football League advertisers, tv network sports sales teams last week frantically scrambled to sell out the strike-truncated NFL season.

The salesmen went from wrapping up the Nov. 21 and 22 NFL coverage to selling availabilities in December pigskin telecasts. Next, the networks will rush into selling January's revamped, crowded post-season playoff package.

But the sales execs were also looking over their shoulders at significant player resentment of the new contract, hoping it will not lead to a resumption of the strike. Assuming the players ratify the contract this week, the season will total nine weeks, including the two before the strike began Sept. 21. A Jan. 2-3 weekend has been added to the regular season. Playoffs, involving eight teams in each conference, will span three weekends, starting Jan. 8-9. The Super Bowl stays put at Jan. 30.

Surveying the damages after seven lost weekends, network executives estimated they had grossed perhaps $50 million from substitute programing instead of the $150 million that the NFL coverage would have tallied. There are no plans to increase commercial time within the NFL telecasts, the tv networks insist.

ABC expects to break even with the skeleton season of Monday night games, said ABC Television president John C. Severino. However, he estimated all three networks have lost $7 million in advertising revenues as a result of the strike.

"But the advertising revenues lost, in our case from broadcasting movies instead of football Monday nights, is offset by the rights we didn't have to pay for the games that were never played," Mr. Severino said. The networks generally would have paid an estimated $15 million weekly for football broadcast rights.

"The strike will have no bottom-line effect on us, but it did affect our ratings. We figure we lost a ratings point each week. If you look at the season-to-date figures, CBS has averaged an 18.1 rating in prime time and ABC a 16.5. CBS would have lost a little of that rating and we would have gained about a point if we had been broadcasting football on Monday nights so far this season, which would have put us in a dead heat right now," he said.

Tv rights payments, which were withheld starting with the Nov. 1 instalment due to the strike, soon will resume; about $110 million was paid up to that point. Still, network sources said, some degree of

Three agencies vie for up to $50 million

Kodak to join int'l accounts

By GAY JERVEY

In its ongoing effort to "make this elephant dance," Eastman Kodak Co. has put as much as $50 million worth of international business up for grabs. The company's three major multinational agencies—Young & Rubicam, McCann-Erickson and longtime partner J. Walter Thompson Co.—are the contenders, with a score of smaller, local agencies the losers.

According to a Kodak spokesman, the move affects only foreign ads for consumer products and film. He also confirmed that those agencies losing Kodak business were given the bad news on Nov. 8, but would not reveal either who or how many there were. He also stressed that some of the departees would be retained for the commercial and industrial products business. Kodak currently employs over 40 agencies internationally.

The amount of business involved could be as low as $30 million and as high as $50 million, depending on how much above and below the line is included. "We are in the process of consolidating our consumer products and film advertising on a worldwide basis," the spokesman continued. "The move is consistent with the company's over-all goal to strengthen and better coordinate market share around the globe."

Well-placed sources say the review involves eight countries—notably where none of its three major agencies has any Kodak business currently. The contenders will make their presentations next month, with a decision forthcoming in January, sources said. The Kodak spokesman said any

May be bigger than IRAs, all-savers

Money market accounts create advertising blitz

An Advertising Age roundup

A heavy ad blitz is expected as banks and savings institutions begin offering new money market accounts in mid-December. In fact, it has already begun in some markets, including Chicago, Los Angeles, San Diego and San Francisco.

Some think the amounts spent in media advertising will exceed those spent on the introductory blitzes for Individual Retirement Accounts and all-savers certificates.

Noted Charles Bartling, vp-director of communications for the National Bank Marketing Institute: "Both of the other [instruments] tended to be timely; the all-savers were a one-shot deal and IRAs have been seasonal promotions." But from the nearly 100 calls his organization received within three days after the regulation passed, it appears that the new accounts "will be more of a general, heavy push across the country," including smaller community institutions that never made heavy efforts on all-savers and IRAs.

The advertising director for Chicago's largest bank, Continental Illinois National Bank, said consumers will likely be "inundated" with advertising over the next few months; Continental itself will spend "one of the highest levels [in its history] in a short amount of time."

Tv spots now airing discuss the attributes of the new account, concluding with: "Coming soon." In Southern California, similar ad pitches have been running for almost three weeks.

"Like every other bank, we want to preempt the market and get the money [that's been directed to money market funds] returned to where it belongs," explained Steve Arnold, vp-advertising director at Continental.

But there are questions in the industry as to how long the pushes will last and how intensive they will be. Officers at major banks express a fear that even if interest rates are pegged to a short-term investment instrument—probably yielding about 2% less than existing money market funds—a high-volume customer response could hurt the banks more than help them.

They also fear that the majority of deposits will come from existing passbook and checking account customers, not from money market funds. If this occurs, they said, it would only raise the cost of money

Campbell reports new products surge

By NANCY GIGES

Just three months after introducing into test a new line of premium frozen dinners, Le Menu, Campbell Soup Co. is so pleased with its success that it emerged as one of the highlights of its annual stockholder meeting late Friday.

Le Menu is just one of many new products that traditionally conservative Campbell is adding to a lengthening list of successful new items. Campbell officials said they have already raised their projections of annual sales for Le Menu from $75 million to over $100 million once it is national.

Indicating the company's commitment to support new ventures, Campbell hiked marketing expenditures in the U.S. during the past two years 72% to $118 million, and promises to spend at an accelerated rate during its current fiscal year that ends next July.

Le Menu was introduced into Texas, Colorado, California, Arizona and Nevada in August. Next spring, Campbell will expand into New York, Delaware, New Jersey and parts of New England. Although executives would not disclose when the brand would be national, it is believed the company is scrambling to meet demand at its plants.

Tony Adams, director-marketing research, said shipments of Le Menu to date are 70% above expectations. Jack Dale, frozen food sales manager, pointed out that the product has achieved 100% distribution of all eight varieties in the line in western markets, an unusually high acceptance rate.

Le Menu carries the Swanson logo and is positioned as a premium-price product. Although the dinners contain less than 500 calories each, they are not touted as diet aids. The company noted that the $2 billion frozen dinner market grew 11% last year, with the premium segment up 37%.

Steve McNeil, general manager, frozen food business, pointed out that Campbell has become the leading producer of frozen foods in the U.S. with its Swanson, Mrs. Paul's, Snow King and Pepperidge Farm brands. Sales, he said, exceed $750 million.

Campbell has been successful with new products in most of its divisions, including Pepperidge Farm with Vegetables 'n Pastry, apple juice and Bisto gravy maker. The company also has spurred

CBS wins 7th week

By DIANE MERMIGAS

The marathon Civil War drama, "The Blue and the Gray," gave CBS enough ammunition to win the prime time ratings war the seventh and probably the eighth weeks of the new season, although ABC programs like "Dynasty" and "Superman" put up a good fight.

The eight-hour miniseries premiered Sunday, Nov. 14, with a 26.9 rating and 40% share of the available tv audience, solidifying CBS' domination for the week. ABC's counterprograming rebroadcast of "Superman" averaged only an 18.9 rating (placing 18th for the week) and 29% share nationally, while NBC's network premiere of "The Blue Lagoon" garnered a 17.1 rating and 24 share (placing 22nd for the week).

"The Blue and the Gray" premiere ranked as the second-highest rated prime time show for the week behind its lead-in, "60 Minutes," which had a 30.4 rating and 46 share.

Such aggressive counterprograming, which characterizes a ratings sweep month like November, resulted in an over-all 67.5% network viewing level Nov. 14, an increase over the 62.8%

Burke reflects on Tylenol woes

New York—Despite deep involvement with his company's Tylenol rehabilitation effort, James Burke, chairman of Johnson & Johnson, insisted on carrying out his responsibilities as dinner committee chairman for the annual Advertising Council Award Dinner at the Waldorf-Astoria here on Nov. 17.

At the dinner, where Frank Cary, chairman of IBM Corp., received the council's 1982 Public Service Award, Mr. Burke delivered a tribute to the IBM leader and, in so doing, related the occasion to his thoughts on the Tylenol situation. He reminded the audience it was just seven weeks ago when "one of our products was used as a murder weapon" and the first deaths occurred among those who inadvertently used cyanide-laced Tylenol Extra-Strength capsules.

Mr. Burke said that on Saturday of that weekend, he and his wife were to be honored at a dinner party in Princeton, N.J., and as they left their house, with the harvest moon glowing, he turned to her and said, "You know, for some reason I don't quite understand, it seems that we're living on the dark side of that moon."

Contrasting that dinner with the Ad Council dinner, he said that on leaving for the Waldorf, he was able to say to his wife, "This is the first good thing that's happened in seven weeks." Mr. Burke went on to explain, "No matter how fragile we think our society is, it is going to survive. It will survive because of the likes of Frank Cary, who we're honoring tonight, and organizations like the Ad Council."

In his talk, Mr. Cary went out of his way to hail Mr. Burke, stating that "no chief executive officer has faced such an unprecedented crisis." The IBM chairman added, "His leadership has been brilliant." Mr. Cary also pointed out that J&J has "used its advertising not as a substitute for action but as a vehicle to deliver information, and it has done this brilliantly and clearly."

At J&J headquarters, however, Mr. Burke is said to favor holding back on resumption of regular product advertising for Tylenol. Mr. Burke appears to rely instead on personal appearances on national talk shows. In addition to network newscasts, he has appeared on the syndicated "Donahue" show and is scheduled to appear on CBS' "60 Minutes."

Financial analysts say they think J&J has no choice but to return to consumer advertising quickly despite any possible risks. "The longer they stay off the airwaves with advertising, the more market share they will lose," predicted one analyst.

He pointed out American Home Products has stepped up spending dramatically for all Anacin products, particularly Anacin-3 nonaspirin, and is couponing heavily.

Interestingly, although AHP is still using actress Patricia Neal in Anacin advertising, it has dropped the "fight back" theme, a phrase that has been used frequently in press coverage of Tylenol.

Schering-Plough also is introducing a St. Joseph nonaspirin for adults nationally, and Bristol-Myers has broken new ad campaigns for both Datril nonaspirin pain reliever and Excedrin PM, highlighting its aspirin-free formula. Previous advertising for the latter did not mention it was aspirin-free and urged, "get the bedtime strength of Excedrin PM."#

Burnett boosts Muse, bolsters creative

Chicago—In what it says is an effort to get more "creative firepower" into its international advertising product, Leo Burnett Co. has named Norman Muse to the new post of vice-chairman and chief creative officer.

Mr. Muse, 48, had been president of the agency's domestic unit, Leo Burnett USA, since August, 1981, when the agency split into two autonomous operations.

"Moving Norm Muse up there gives us some additional help across the board, especially on international clients," agency chairman-chief executive officer John Kinsella said in discussing a series of management changes made last week.

Elected chairman-chief executive officer of the domestic agency is Hall (Cap) Adams, most recently exec vp-marketing services. Mr. Adams, 49, takes a position vacant since the death last February of Eugene McKeough.

According to Mr. Kinsella, the agency waited this long to replace Mr. McKeough so that Mr. Adams (in taking on the responsibilities temporarily) could familiarize himself with the domestic operation. It also gave Mr. Adams and two other executives promoted in August, 1981, a chance "to develop some continuity and evolve into a new organization as opposed to just throwing everyone up and starting all over."

The two executives he refers to are Richard Stanwood, 55, who was named to take Mr. Muse's post as president of Leo Burnett USA and given the additional title of chief creative officer, and Tom Heath, 52, who was appointed to the new post of vice-chairman of USA, with responsibility for client and marketing services.

Mr. Stanwood had been exec vp-creative services, and Mr. Heath had been exec vp-client services for the past 11 months. They both will report to Mr. Adams.

Mr. Muse, Mr. Adams and Al Wiggins, chairman-chief executive officer, Leo Burnett International, will report to Mr. Kinsella. Jack Kopp remains chairman of the board and of the executive committee.

Plans for replacements for Messrs Adams, Stanwood and Heath were not revealed, but an announcement of more new appointments is expected this week.#

Taco Bell picks Tracy-Locke

By RUTH STROUD

PepsiCo's Taco Bell, hoping to increase its leading share of the Mexican fast-food market, has named Tracy-Locke/BBDO, Dallas, to handle its almost $20 million account.

T-L also is agency for Frito-Lay, another PepsiCo unit, but that was "totally irrelevant" to the choice, which was based on evaluation of media, creative, promotion and personnel, according to Taco Bell vp-marketing Richard Deleguardia. The agency's BBDO affiliation and proximity to key Taco Bell markets were also factors.

The chain is headquartered in Irvine, Cal.; it earlier split with Grey Advertising, Los Angeles, reportedly over creative differences (AA, Oct. 18).

Others competing for the account included Foote, Cone & Belding/Honig, San Francisco; Ogilvy & Mather, Los Angeles, and Doyle Dane Bernbach/West, Los Angeles. FCB, whose Chicago office is already the agency for Pizza Hut, another PepsiCo unit, was given an edge by some insiders.

■ PH president Art Gunther's presence during the presentations at the request of PepsiCo foodservice division president Don Smith was not a factor, Mr. Deleguardia claimed. "Art was invited to participate so we could call upon his expertise, but he wasn't in on the decision," he said.

Taco Bell, with about 1,600 stores in 46 states, is the undisputed leader in the Mexican fast-food segment, with a market share "in the 50% range," Mr. Deleguardia said. Since the Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo acquired Taco Bell in 1978, the company has almost doubled its outlets and seen its budget jump from about $3.5 million in 1978 to close to $20 million projected for 1983. Still, the agency switch and other signals seem to indicate that PepsiCo feels there is even more growth potential there.

While new products, facades and drive-through stores are in the works, Taco Bell plans to stick with its "core business"—Mexican-style fast-food—for the moment. "That doesn't mean that we won't ever branch out, though," Mr. Deleguardia remarked.

S&O Consultants, San Francisco, is working on a new identity project for the chain which sources say is "dramatic" and will give it a more upscale image without backing away from the ethnic theme.#

Schering-Plough drops two

Memphis—In one fell swoop last week, Schering-Plough eliminated Marschalk Co. and Foote, Cone & Belding, both New York, from its agency roster. It reassigned products from those agencies to the Bloom Agency, Dallas, and Warwick Advertising, New York.

Bloom captured almost $20 million of the business with the assignment of Aftate, Feen-A-Mint, Tropical Blend and Solarcaine from Foote, Cone & Belding, and Maybelline Moisture Whip cosmetics, Daydream fragrance and unidentified new products from Marschalk. Bloom already handles Schering-Plough's Di-Gel and some new product assignments.

Warwick, on Plough's roster since 1967, picked up Maybelline's Ultra-Slim lipstick, Brush/Blush brands, Kissing Glosses, Shine and Shape, Cover Stick and unidentified new products. All came from Marschalk and are Warwick's first Maybelline division assignments.

Warwick also gained Coppertone Shade products and Regutol laxative from FCB, and a new product: St. Joseph aspirin-free analgesic tablets for adults.

Spending on the Warwick portion was not disclosed. But in 1981 the bulk of those brands received around $1.5 million in measured media support, according to Leading National Advertisers.#

Della Femina/McNamee debuts

New York—Jerry Della Femina, chairman-partner of Della Femina, Travisano & Partners, and Louise McNamee, Della Femina senior vp-research, have formed a new company called Della Femina/McNamee Marketing. While both Mr. Della Femina and Ms. McNamee will continue in their current posts, Ms. McNamee will serve as president of Della Femina/McNamee.

The new company will offer marketing, research and creative services consulting on a project-by-project basis. According to Mr. Della Femina, the parent agency has had a longstanding policy not to take on any business unless it is named the full-service agency of record.

The new unit is based at the parent company's offices at 625 Madison Ave., 10022.#

Apollo seeks reorganization

Dallas—Games by Apollo, a marketer of home videogames, filed a petition for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the Federal Bankruptcy Code. The filing followed a lawsuit by its agency, Benton & Bowles, seeking to stop shipment of Apollo's cartridges.

According to sources, Benton & Bowles stands to lose $2.8 million in unpaid bills as a result of Games by Apollo's shutdown. B&B also has pulled all current advertising.

The year-old company named the New York agency last July to handle its estimated $20 million account, beginning with a $7.5 million pre-Christmas drive.

Apollo had claimed to have had a hot start this year in terms of retail sales, and had projected continued brisk growth at retail—$30 million-plus—for September to January.#

Kodak int'l account open

changes will be fully operative by mid-July.

The move is held to be long overdue. The company is described by industry observers as somewhat gangling in its international approach. "Look, 40 agencies is a hell of a lot," says one analyst. Sources say any coordination has been difficult owing to the fact that many of the agencies are local, and thus operate without regard to an overall worldwide marketing blueprint in some instances.

Kodak has shown signs of becoming more aggressive, both domestically and abroad, for some time now. Although still commanding some 40% of the worldwide photographic business, the company seems increasingly aware that even a lofty pinnacle can be vulnerable. Analysts cite the fact that competitors, such as Fuji and Agfa-Gevaert, recently have been looking alarmingly alive and feisty.

In the last month, Kodak has announced specific agency reviews in England and Germany. Lintas, Hamburg, is losing its $6 million Kodak account, and Kodak is reviewing its $8.5 million London account, which for the past four years has been at McCann-Erickson. Kodak declined to name the other countries involved. Both J. Walter Thompson Co. and Young & Rubicam handle Kodak advertising here and abroad. McCann handles only Kodak international business.

At any rate, sources predict that the current review is Step 1 in the ultimate consolidation of its worldwide advertising, with the three slugging it out next month. And the fight promises to be hot: "Oh, for sure," said an agency exec not involved in the review. "The chance to get your hands on this type of multinational business just doesn't come around that often."#

NAB studies future of code

By STANLEY E. COHEN

WASHINGTON—The antitrust lawsuit over tv code time standards has finally been settled, and the National Assn. of Broadcasters will weigh the prospect of resuming self-regulation.

The tv and radio code boards will meet shortly to discuss the prospects, and an initial proposal may be ready for the full NAB board of directors when it meets at Puerto Vallarta, Mexico, the week of Jan. 16.

Earlier there were indications that influential NAB members welcomed the opportunity to be rid of the costly code operation. Lately, however, there appear to be some second thoughts on the subject, as NAB hears from powerful special-interest groups which are uneasy about possible erosion of continuity acceptance standards.

Clayton Brace, vp-general manager, KGTV, San Diego, the tv code review board chairman, said he remains persuaded that there is a place for some regulation agreed to by members. What this can be, however, in view of the legal risks, will depend on what the lawyers have to propose when the tv and radio code boards meet for their briefing.

At present, the codes are in abeyance, suspended since mid-year after federal district court Judge Harold H. Greene ruled that piggyback provisions are a per se antitrust violation. Except for Jerry Lansner, the code director, the code staff has already been dismantled, so a decision to resume would involve putting Humpty Dumpty back together again.

Mr. Lansner is among those who are hopeful that "the phoenix will rise out of the ashes with most of its feathers intact." But he foresees lots of uncertainty and serious work. Initially, perhaps, a statement that the board of directors could consider in January supporting additional work toward a new code, as a prelude to the more detailed proposals which would be developed later.

The settlement negotiated by NAB and the Justice Department, and accepted by Judge Greene last week, ends the antitrust suit by barring NAB from promulgating and enforcing rules related to time standards and piggybacking. Earlier, Judge Greene ruled that the piggyback provisions of the code are per se law violations and that other time standards should be tested in court because they seem to be equally illegal.

Under the consent settlement, NAB specifically promised the Justice Department it would stop

Advertisers in syndication shift

By CRAIG REISS

NEW YORK—Advertisers and programers are predicting bumper years ahead for original syndicated properties as broadcast network inventories tighten up.

Predicted increased advertising spending next year, coupled with shrinking network inventories, will force advertisers to move large portions of their revitalized media budgets into alternative advertising avenues, several agencies and advertisers maintain.

As a result, major tv advertisers, unable to spend all of their money in network tv, are expected to search out original syndicated properties to handle the overflow of tv dollars.

According to agency and client sources, an economic rebound in 1983 would unleash pent-up media dollars over the next two years when network inventories will shrink due to upfront buys for the 1984 Olympics and the startup of political advertising for the 1984 national elections.

The impact of the shrunken network availabilities is being compounded by the increasing number of new national advertisers on network tv, including home computers and videogames, sources note. The higher number of advertisers competing for a smaller network inventory will spark the laws of supply and demand and allow networks to continue the trend set this year for double-digit price increases in the upfront markets.

Phil Guarascio, senior vp-director of media management at Benton & Bowles, whose programing subsidiary, Telecom, last month syndicated "Golden Showcase: Shock Trauma" for General Foods, said: "Whenever there is exaggerated pressure against the network marketplace, syndication does better, especially considering the networks' asking price. It is very possible that advertisers will get into original syndication. That's already happening with advertisers expressing interest in some properties. But advertisers can't just turn on the programing tap. They're limited by what's available."

The nation's leading tv advertiser, Procter & Gamble, has already gotten into the act; it is producing original made-for-tv movies for syndication. The first

Stewart's Ford ads irk ABC

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

NEW YORK—ABC Sports may sever its relationship with Jackie Stewart due to the three-time world champion race car driver's new role as on-air spokesman for Ford Motor Co.

Irv Brodsky, a spokesman for ABC Sports, said network executives believe Mr. Stewart, who is an analyst on ABC's coverage of all major automobile races including the Indianapolis 500, already may have lost his credibility and compromised his position as an objective commentator by appearing in the spots that began in late September.

"As a result of his participation [in the Ford commercials], there is a good possibility that he will not be doing auto racing with us again," Mr. Brodsky said. Mr. Stewart is not scheduled to appear in any of ABC's upcoming racing telecasts.

Mr. Brodsky said that a clause in Mr. Stewart's contract with the network stipulates that he is supposed to notify ABC before entering into any endorsement agreements. In the case of the Ford commercials, Mr. Brodsky said that Mr. Stewart did not contact the network.

Join the pain reliever onslaught

Datril, new St. Joseph rushing after Tylenol

By NANCY GIGES

Two additional brands, St. Joseph and Datril, are joining a growing list of pain relievers whose nonaspirin formulas are being promoted to consumers over the nation's airwaves.

The heavier promotion of analgesics continues as Chicago Mayor Jane Byrne last week lifted her ban on the sale of McNeil Consumer Products' Tylenol line, provided they are packaged in tamper-resistant containers. Sales have not been allowed in Chicago since Tylenol cyanide poisonings occurred in late September.

Schering-Plough, Memphis, is promising ad spending at a $20 million annual rate to introduce new St. Joseph maximum strength nonaspirin, and New York-based Bristol-Myers has broken its first major advertising in four years for its Datril, urging consumers to "ask your doctor about Datril."

This marks the first major ad support for the brand since it lost a head-to-head battle with Tylenol in the 1970s.

The new Datril 500 ads, by Kenyon & Eckhardt, show a woman asking, "I want an aspirin-free pain reliever. What do I do now?" An announcer responds: "Ask your doctor about Datril." The spot notes that it "contains the same aspirin-free pain reliever hospitals use most. . .you can't buy a stronger aspirin-free pain reliever."

The commercial includes a demonstration of how the package is "factory-sealed" in a shrink-wrapped box. Newspaper ads with a similar theme also are running.

The Datril brand was launched to much fanfare in the mid-'70s with a comparative price campaign against Tylenol. Johnson & Johnson responded to the aggressive new competitor by lowering the price of Tylenol, and B-M's price positioning lost its impact. The company then couldn't come up with the right advertising to make the item profitable.

The company called on actor John Wayne to tout extra-strength Datril 500 as "strong medicine for a headache, but it's gentle." But that campaign did not work out. B-M later tried a comparative print campaign against two prescription pain relievers. By 1979, all advertising support was dropped.

The St. Joseph campaign is expected to break in about one month. Schering-Plough has told the trade that it will spend $7 million during the first four introductory months. A full range of promotional activities is planned, including sampling and couponing.

The St. Joseph line also is being expanded to include a children's nonaspirin chewable tablet as well. These products are assigned to

'Nation's Business' shortfall irks buyers

By RICHARD L. GORDON and STUART J. ELLIOTT

WASHINGTON—There will be a new rate base and new ad rates on Jan. 1 at Nation's Business, the monthly magazine of the United States Chamber of Commerce, as its managers face up to a dramatic plunge in circulation.

Meanwhile, the chamber is promising space credit rebates to advertisers and said a number of steps are being taken to reverse the circulation declines.

Disclosure of plans for the January rate card changes, six months ahead of schedule, and the rebate promise were parts of an effort by the chamber to control the damage done by having its circulation woes sprung on advertisers via a front page story in the Washington Post.

Media directors of ad agencies which have purchased space in Nation's Business for their clients reacted with surprise, dismay and, in some cases, harsh words, to news of the magazine's unreported major shortfall in circulation.

"At worst, it's downright dishonest," said Eugene McCarthy, senior vp-director of media/marketing services, J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit, "and at best it shows terrible mismanagement."

The Nation's Business flap is the latest in an epidemic of bad news at the chamber, much of it recession-related. At the highest level, its president, Richard Lesher, barely emerged with his job intact in a fight this fall over operating deficits, caused in part by the slow takeoff of a pet Lesher project, the lavishly funded Biznet private tv network.

Leaked documents suggested not only that Nation's Business has not been meeting its circulation guarantees, but that some chamber execs had been alarmed about the accuracy of its circulation numbers as long as a year ago. Shortly be-

Seagram mixers launched

NEW YORK—Having failed once before to establish a line of mixers under a new name, and unable to obtain the franchises for either Canada Dry or Schweppes, Coca-Cola Bottling Co. of New York has opted for what it believes is the next best way to enter the mixer category: A line under the Seagram's name.

Coca-Cola of New York has set up a new subsidiary, Premium Beverages, that is licensed by Jos. E. Seagram & Sons to use its well-known name. Premium has introduced the four items—ginger ale, tonic, club soda and seltzer—into Maine, Vermont and New Hampshire.

"If all goes well, we'll have another Diet Coke-like gala just after the holidays," said James Patton, vp-director of media and promotions for the bottler. That will mark the expansion of the line into some of the bottler's bigger markets, probably to include metropolitan New York.

The soft drinks are available in a variety of cans and bottles and are getting tv, radio and print advertising, created by Della Femina, Travisano & Partners. Media buy-

Koenig still not afraid to 'think small'

Hall of famer happy in 'no-growth agency'

By FRED DANZIG

NEW YORK—Julian Koenig, who once expressed a fear of becoming "the world's oldest living copywriter," feels that he has in fact become just that, now that he is running "the only no-growth agency in town," Julian Koenig Inc.

Thanks to his easy-gaited, low-key approach to the traditionally high-stress agency business, and the fact that there are always enough simpatico client types around who will get in line and try to persuade Mr. Koenig to personally do their ads, this member of the Copywriters' Hall of Fame (class of '66) more likely has matured into the world's youngest 61-year-old copywriter.

Mr. Koenig has found that one doesn't have to run an agency. One can do it in a walk, for his is a deliberately geared-down operation that appears to have evolved into some kind of business world manifestation of the "Think small" ad he created for the Volkswagen "bug." By staying small, he finds himself telling the talented people he must bring in from time to time, when the work load piles up, that they would be better off working for another agency. His is a "no-growth" shop, remember, and he takes that definition seriously.

So he has become a sometime agency talent placement specialist, just as he himself is occasionally sounded out on whether he would join one of the big, hard-charging agencies that are in office towers hard by his comfortable office on the seventh floor of Park Avenue's homey Delmonico, where he works surrounded by original paintings by Paul Davis, Robert Dash and Sheridan Lord, friends from his other home-away-from-home on the South Fork of Long Island.

The creator of the revolutionary and inspirational "Think small" and "Lemon" ads for Volkswagen while at Doyle Dane Bernbach in 1959, Mr. Koenig is still turning out ads and copy that sing, that break free. Whether he is developing for Timex watches a tv commercial "torture test" wherein a 700-lb. elephant stomps a watch and shatters it before the disbelieving eyes of John Cameron Swayze, or, with graphic design master Milton Glaser, crafting labor-of-love ads for a friend's Manhattan restaurant, Mr. Koenig stands for a certain honesty of approach in advertising. He believes in the declarative sentence. He strives to phrase freshly. And he looks to absorb, to develop a jugular sense of a product or service, something that will make the consumer want it. He has an ironclad desire to sell, to convince, and an energy level to match.

When he was inducted into the Copywriters' Hall of Fame on April 19, 1966, Mr. Koenig spoke of the old mail-order ad writers and how their work revealed

Result of comparative ads

Burger King gets awareness boost

By JOSEPH M. WINSKI

Burger King's controversial comparative advertising campaign had a marked effect on consumer awareness of fast-food advertising in October.

Burger King posted the largest monthly gain in awareness of any advertiser surveyed in the first seven months of adWatch, while industry leader McDonald's Corp.'s advertising suffered the largest decline recorded to date by any advertiser.

Burger King's awareness soared 15.7 percentage points in October, to 24.1% of all responses to a question asking consumers to identify the fast-food advertising that first came to mind. McDonald's still led the category with 35.6% of all responses, but that was down 10 points from September and McDonald's lowest score to date.

The awareness gap between Burger King and McDonald's narrowed to just 11.5 points in October. In June, before beginning a streak of three significant monthly declines in four months, McDonald's led Burger King by 43.7 points.

AdWatch, a joint project of ADVERTISING AGE and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb., attempts to measure advertising awareness by asking consumers to identify the advertising that first comes to mind for 20 product categories, of all advertising seen or heard in the previous 30 days. For the October survey, 1,253 consumers nation-

world news roundup

LONDON—Rowntree Mackintosh moved its $1.6 million Drister candy account to Ogilvy & Mather from J. Walter Thompson Co.

RIO DE JANEIRO—R.J. Reynolds Tobacco's agency for the Camel and Winston accounts in Brazil, Lage, Stabel & Guerreiro/BBDO, resigned the business last week, giving no reasons. Camel was launched nine weeks ago in a massive tv campaign, and Winston is in test market. J. Walter Thompson Co. is in the running for the assignment.

AMSTERDAM—BBDO Industrial will gain by January a lion's share of the $25 million telecommunications account of the government's post office, telephone and telegraph monopoly, which is aiming for more business from the industrial market.

LONDON—Britain's new Channel 4 last week attracted only 5% of the viewing audience after attracting a disappointing 6% in its first week. Channel 4 is challenging the figures.

BONN—The new Christian Democrat government next year will ask for an agreement with Radio Television Luxembourg allowing controlled transmissions from RTL's satellite to beam into Germany.

MEXICO CITY—Editorial America bought seven magazines last week from Mexico's tv monopoly, Televisa, including Mexico's leading TV Guide-type magazine, Teleguia.

MILAN—Private commercial and local tv stations for the first time have outstripped the government's RAI network in ad revenue, attracting 50% of prime time viewers.

Hauser out; clash hinted

NEW YORK—The resignation last week of Gustave M. Hauser as chief executive officer of Warner Amex Cable Communications prompted some on Wall Street to speculate that discontent over greater-than-anticipated losses for the cable concern by half-owner American Express, along with personality clashes with directors, led to the unexpected resignation. AmEx is a partner with Warner Communications in the business.

Mr. Hauser, in announcing his resignation, cited his desire to pursue private investment opportunities in the electronic communications industry. He plans to stay until a successor is found. Considered by cable industry executives to be shrewd, aggressive and visionary, Mr. Hauser is credited with pioneering the highly touted interactive Qube system that inevi-

RUSHING NEW COMPANY'S FIRST ADS

O&M answers the Bell

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

As Graham Phillips, exec vp-managing director at Ogilvy & Mather, concluded the agency's final presentation for the $30 million American Bell account to a team of American Telephone & Telegraph execs on Nov. 18, he told them, "We are ready to go tomorrow."

This literally was the marching order AT&T gave to O&M when it awarded the coveted account to the agency. Last Monday morning, AT&T vp Arch McGill telephoned O&M president Ken Roman and said, "Can you stop by out here tonight for a drink, some dinner and get set to go to work for us?"

To that invitation, Mr. Roman said, "I replied, in this order, thank you and yes."

And off to American Bell's new offices at Bedminster, N.J., trooped the team from O&M, now the agency for American Bell's advanced information systems unit, a unit that will compete in the business-to-business area. And it has had little time since then to savor its victory because the agency is pushing to meet a Jan. 1 deadline to introduce the new company that operates AT&T's unregulated businesses.

Robert T. Warstler, director of advertising for American Bell's advanced information systems unit, said the feeling of urgency has already been transmitted to his people. "They realize the work done during the presentations will begin to look like intramurals compared to what is required over the next five weeks."

Mr. Phillips said the agency made tv production commitments long before it knew it would get the account. According to the agency's agreement with American Bell, the same team that headed the presentations—which includes Mr. Phillips, Norman Berry, exec-vp, creative director, and Bill Morrissey, exec vp-management supervisor at O&M Direct—would also work on the American Bell account.

Mr. Morrissey apparently was a key to O&M's success, since American Bell will rely heavily on direct response to reach hundreds of thousands of small-business men who comprise its market for advanced information systems.

Mr. Warstler said that 41 people from American Bell would be responsible for marketing and advertising. Mr. Phillips said that O&M has not yet settled on the size of the staff that will handle the account, which will be one of the agency's largest.

During the long period of presentations, Mr. Warstler said, O&M's professionalism stood out in Inventories cloud cigaret survey

By JOHN C. MAXWELL JR.

It is with fear and trepidation that we approach this year's annual survey. In fact, for a while we considered not publishing one. But having more guts than brains, we decided to take a stab at it.

The basic problem is how the inventory situation is going to turn out. The current high level of inventories is the result of price increases that have occurred in the past several months as well as those that are anticipated in the next several months.

R.J. Reynolds stated it will not raise prices again until the first of the year. RJR suggested its first price increase of $1.50 per thousand for nonfilter and 85mm filter and $2 per thousand for 100mm and 120mm filter (in August) was for its own pockets, and the second increase of $2 per thousand (in early October) was in anticipation of the excise tax increase of $4 per thousand on Jan. 1. Thus, we infer that Reynolds will raise prices another $2 per thousand, probably sometime early in '83.

The other five producers, however, have given no indication that they will follow Reynolds' lead. There is an estimated 40¢ to 50¢ per thousand spread between companies now, and we believe it will have to be closed one way or another by the first of the year. Therefore, the major question is how far inventories will drop on retail and consumer levels by year's end.

On the other side of the coin, a floor tax goes in at the end of the year in the amount of the excise tax: $4 per thousand for producers and wholesalers as well as retailers that are owned by wholesalers. Thus, it is incumbent upon the industry to get inventories down as far as possible, to minimize the cost of these taxes. This year, then, could see inventory swings in excess of 10 billion units one way or the other, which would throw my estimates off.

The next area of uncertainty is the first quarter of calendar year 1983. Here again, much depends on the inventory situation at year's end. If inventories are relatively high, there would be heavy liquidation in the first quarter, along with a major drop in company unit sales. If, on the other hand, inventories are modest—as we are suggesting tentatively in our yearend report—the effect on the first quarter will not be great.

Further complicating the matter is the question of consumption. By year's end the preponderant share of price increases will be in effect, and we then will have a better idea of the impact these changes have had. Currently, we would expect that retail pricing between August and Jan. 1 will have risen 12¢ to 14¢ per pack, or an almost 20% jump from the average price of 72¢ before the August increase—the largest increase in U.S. history.

On the bullish side, two points should be kept in mind. First, the major cities, with their high taxes already are seeing retail prices of 90¢ to $1 per pack; therefore, another dime or so dribbled in over time may not have much impact. Second, by dribbling the increase in—a few cents here and a few cents there—the consumer may become somewhat inured to the new levels. On the bearish side, however, is the possibility that consumers will be upset by the price increases, resulting in a downward trend in consumption for some time.

At the moment, we stand somewhere between the two extremes. Excluding inventories, we believe retail consumption for 1982 will be relatively flat. We would expect that in the fourth quarter of this year and the first quarter of next, retail consumption may drop 1% to 3% but begin to recover late in 1983. Time will tell which of these scenarios turns out to be correct.

Our preliminary numbers show that Reynolds remains the leader in the total market with a 33.4% share, up 0.4% from last year. Philip Morris continues to run a very close second with a 33% share, up 1.2% from a year earlier. At this rate, Philip Morris probably will claim the No. 1 position during calendar year 1983. It also should be noted that American Brands and Lorillard now are tied for fourth with an 8.9% market share each. In the brand areas, the only movement was in Philip Morris products, with Benson & Hedges moving up to fifth, tying with Reynolds' Camel, and with Merit outstripping American Brands' Pall Mall to take the sixth position.

The larger brands with the best growth rates are: Reynolds' Vantage, up 5.3%, and Camel, up 9.4% (which, combined with their two smaller brands, were the main factors in moving Reynolds ahead); More, up 9.8%, and Now, up 8.2%. Philip Morris' Marlboro (up 6.8%) continues to do an extraordinary job, and now accounts for almost one out of every five cigarets smoked in the U.S. It continues to be the cornerstone of the company. Benson & Hedges is also up an excellent 9.1%. The other two winners were Lorillard's Newport (up 14.8%) and Liggett's generic products (up more than 100%).

An interesting sidelight is the fact that the low-tar area appears to be topping out. It only had 61.1% in 1982 vs. 59.6% in 1981, but the group actually has been showing declines in market share recently. The "full-flavored" product appears to be making a comeback, a pattern not unlike one seen a few years ago in Germany. The market share of menthol cigarets continues to decline slightly, along with the charcoal filters. The only real growth in market share is in the plain-filter area, which is up more than a point.#

Newspapers back as top ad buy for industry

FTC says 1980 cigaret ad total was $1.24 billion

WASHINGTON—The government's latest tally of U.S. cigaret advertising and promotion spending puts the 1980 total at $1.24 billion, a 13% increase over 1979, with newspapers back in the top spot as the industry's biggest ad buy.

Released by the Federal Trade Commission last week, months behind the normal publishing schedule, the 1980 numbers reflect actual spending as reported to the government by the six major U.S. cigaret companies. Only industrywide totals are reported.

■ Newspapers took in 24.5% of the industrywide cigaret ad/promotion budget in 1980, the medium's best year in the cigaret category since 1977, when newspapers also scored 24.5%. The 1979 newspaper share of cigaret company spending was 22.2%.

Magazines, No. 1 in 1979, slid 2.4 percentage points in the FTC's tally, from 23.8% in 1979 to 21.4% in 1980. Since 1975, the only year weaker than 1980 for magazines was 1978, when the medium's share of cigaret ad/promotion spending was 21.1%.

From 1975-80, newspapers have been the share leader four times and magazines twice, according to the FTC's data.

The FTC figures also show industrywide spending on promotional allowances was up sharply from depressed 1979 levels, and that expenditures on sampling fell to the lowest share of total spending in six years.

The commission offered no interpretation of the spending figures in its report, which is required by Congress. But it noted as an upward pressure on spending that Brown & Williamson launched its Barclay brand cigaret in September, 1980, amidst trade reports of $150 million in ad and promotion suppport.

In dollar terms, the cigaret companies told the FTC they spent $304.4 million in newspapers during 1980, up from $241 million in 1979. For magazines, the 1980 total was $266.2 million, up from $257.7 million in 1979.

Outdoor advertising rebounded from 1979's 15% of the cigaret industry budget, its poorest share performance since 1975, to 15.6% in 1980.

The 1980 spending total in outdoor was $193.3 million, up from $163 million in 1979. Outdoor's share has been up and down since it scored a 17.2% in 1975.

In other major cigaret ad/promotion spending categories:

- Promotional allowances absorbed 14.4%, or $179.1 million, of the 1980 industry spending total, up from 12.7%, or $137.1 million, in 1979. The 1975-80 share range is 12.7% (1979) to 14.7% (1975).
- Point-of-sale ad expenditures took 6.4%, or $79.8 million, of the 1980 total, compared with the previous year's 6.1%, worth $66.1 million. The 1975-80 share range is 5.9% (1977) to 7.2% (1975).
- Sampling distribution took 4.1% of the 1980 total, or $50.5 million, off sharply from 1979's 5.9%, or $64.3 million. The 1975-80 share range is 4.1% (1980) to 6.3% (1976).
- Transit ad spending took 2.1% of the total, worth $26.1 million in 1980, from 2%, worth $21.2 million in 1979. The 1975-80 share range is 2% (1979) to 3% (1976).

The FTC said the six companies spent $50 million on distribution of premiums and other items bearing brand names in 1980, 4% of the total spending compared with 4.1% in 1979, then worth $44.8 million. It was the first share decline for this category since 1975, when the reported share was 1.4%.

Distribution of nonbranded premiums and other nonbranded items took 1.5% of the total, or $19.2 million, compared with 1.6%, or $17.2 million, in 1979. The share range has been 0.7% (1975) to 1.8% (1978).

Special events sponsorships climbed to 1.4% of the 1980 total, or $17 million, from 1% in 1979, or $10.8 million. The share range is 1% (1979) to 1.7% (1975).#

Ads give BK awareness boost

wide were polled from Oct. 1 through Oct. 21.

In addition to its jump in category awareness, Burger King climbed from unranked to No. 3 in "top of mind" awareness of all advertising regardless of category, behind Coca-Cola and Miller beer. That marked Burger King's first appearance in the over-all top 10. McDonald's dropped to No. 6 from No. 3 in September.

Burger King launched its comparative campaign—claiming that its Whopper beat McDonald's Big Mac and Wendy's International's single hamburger in taste tests and that its regular hamburger is 20% larger than McDonald's—on Sept. 26. Burger King, a unit of Pillsbury Co., said before the campaign broke that it would back the effort with the greatest media weight it has ever given a campaign (AA, Sept. 20), upping spending for the fourth quarter by 25% from the year-ago quarter.

However, the J. Walter Thompson USA-created campaign drew lawsuits from Wendy's and McDonald's, leading to an out-of-court settlement in which Burger King agreed to phase out the campaign (AA, Nov. 1).

While many observers believed the Burger King campaign would increase awareness of advertising for the entire category, adWatch found only a slight decrease in the number of people who responded "Don't know" when asked to name a fast-food ad. In October, 17% said they couldn't name an ad, vs. 19% in September. The 2 point difference falls short of the 2.8 point change required for statistical significance. Although Wendy's also was a named target of the Burger king ads, awareness of Wendy's advertising wasn't appreciably affected. It was mentioned by 5% of the respondents in October, and by 4.4% in September.

The Burger King and McDonald's changes were the most dramatic October results, but there also was significant movement in awareness in other categories:

Airlines: United fell 3.2 points to 12.1%, dropping it to No. 2 in the category from No. 1 in September. Eastern rose to No. 1 with 14.2% of the responses vs. 12.4% the previous month. American posted a significant 3.3 point rise, but remained No. 3 with 9.8%.

Beer: Miller, which ushered in its new "Welcome to Miller Time" campaign, scored a 3.2 point rise in awareness, solidifying its hold on No. 1 with a 19.2% score. The scores include mentions of regular Miller beer as well as the company's Lite brand. Budweiser, which appeared to ease back on its Budweiser Light advertising, was again No. 2 with 13.6% (again, mentions of Bud and Bud Light are combined), down from 14.8% in September, and Coors remained No. 3 with 6.2%, down from 7.6%.

Cameras: Polaroid, with a new series of spots featuring James Garner and Mariette Hartley, reversed a steady five-month slide that saw its awareness score plunge to 5.4% in September from 16% in April. In October, Polaroid's awareness rose 3.3 points to 8.7%. Polaroid remained No. 3 in the category, behind Kodak and Canon. Kodak's awareness fell 3.8 points to 24.7%, however. Canon's held steady at 13.3%, vs. 13.4% in September.

Cars & trucks: Ford posted a 4.2 point rise to 18.2% to widen its lead over the No. 2 advertiser, which in October was Chevrolet with 11.9%, up from 11%. Toyota's score fell a significant 4.9 points to 6.2%, dropping Toyota to No. 3 from No. 2.

Wine & liquor: Gallo, which broke a new series of commercials by Ogilvy & Mather, San Francisco, during the World Series, achieved a significant 3.1 point rise to 6.2%, enabling it to take away the No. 1 spot from Riunite, even though Riunite's score also rose, to 5% from 4.2%. Paul Masson was third with 2.3%, down from 3%.

Medicine & drugs: Tylenol, which stopped its Extra-Strength Tylenol advertising after cyanide-laced capsules of the product were blamed for seven deaths in Chicago in late September, dropped 3.2 points in awareness but still led the category with 16.6% of responses. Anacin and Bayer remained Nos. 2 and 3, respectively, with no significant changes in their scores.

Reflecting, perhaps, the widespread publicity over the Tylenol deaths, Tylenol ranked No. 5 in top-of-mind awareness of all advertising, making the top 10 for the first time. (It's likely that some respondents had news stories in mind rather than product advertising when responding, although SRI interviewers stressed that they were interested only in ads. It's also likely that some of Burger King's October mentions were triggered by news coverage of the fast-food advertising controversy as much as by specific ads.)

The top ten in over-all top-of-mind awareness were: No. 1, Coca-Cola; No. 2, Miller; No. 3, Burger King; No. 4, Pepsi-Cola (the first time it didn't finish second to Coke); No. 5, Tylenol; No. 6, McDonald's; No. 7, Budweiser; No. 8, Ford; No. 9, Marlboro, and, tied for No. 10, Bell Telephone and Chevrolet. Marlboro, like Tylenol and Burger King, was new to the top 10 in October.#

VHD system victim of shakeout. . .

By MORRIE GELMAN

The shakeout in the new video technology field has claimed another victim. The highly touted VHD, or video high density, videodisc system is now, at best, in a hold pattern or, at worst, a footnote to the history of communications in the 1980s.

The four international partners in the two-year attempt to launch the VHD videodisc system in the U.S., after thrice postponing the market introduction, decided last week that "the uncertain economic and market environment" suggests that hesitation is the better part of valor. They're dismantling the VHD Programs distribution and production company in Hollywood and the VHD Disc Mfg. Co. facility in Irvine, Cal., laying off some 120 workers in the process.

Formed by General Electric Co., Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. of Japan, Victor Company of Japan and Thorn EMI of the U.K., the venture was to get the VHD system started in the U.S. first in late 1981, then by the end of the first quarter of this year or the second quarter.

A year ago last August, Gary Dartnall, president of VHD Programs, explaining that because of the complexity of creating compatability between different tv systems in different countries, introduction of VHD was rescheduled to a Japanese introduction in April, 1982, closely followed by U.S. introduction in June, 1982, and late June or July in Western Europe.

■ At the winter Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas, a marketing spokesman for JVC said the VHD player would not be introduced until the summer of 1983. Poor economic conditions and disappointing sales results for the two competing laser optical disc and capacitance electronic disc systems were given as the reasons for that further delay.

None of the VHD introduction target dates were kept.

The VHD disc player was to sell for about $500. It appears that the VHD partners believed that positioning their player at a lower price would undermine potential returns on their investment to the point where going to market no longer seemed economically feasible.#

. . .but discs called pirate foil

New York—To those program owners and film producers concerned about the program pirating problem, an RCA Corp. executive has suggested that videodiscs might be virtually pirate-proof, rather than the easily copied videocassettes.

"You can duplicate audio and videotapes in your attic or garage," said Thomas Kuhn, RCA's staff vp for videodiscs, "but you cannot make a videodisc without first making a very substantial investment in plant, equipment and technology."

Addressing programing and film executives at an International Tape/Disc Assn. seminar here, Mr. Kuhn suggested that to discourage piracy, currently draining nearly $1 billion a year in revenues from legitimate owners of programing, program owners and producers consider going the disc route.

"If you program owners are serious about fighting piracy," he told the ITA audience, "then earmark one new title for release on disc only. Then any cassettes that appear on the market would obviously be illegal." Tracing and policing thus would become "much easier and prosecution much faster," Mr. Kuhn said.#

Jovan eyes higher price tier

Chicago—Jovan's latest dual men-and-women fragrances launch, Gambler and Lady (AA, Nov. 15), will give the marketer a higher pricing tier in department, drug and specialty stores.

Both the names and the ad themes come from songs made popular by singer Kenny Rogers.

Scheduled for early spring introductions, Gambler for men will include cologne, aftershave and ancillary products, priced from $5 to $14, while the Lady line will offer dusting powder, various colognes and perfumes from $6.50 to $35.

Lady will be backed by a campaign concentrated in tv and radio, centering around a variation of the song "Lady," written by Lionel Richie and recorded by Kenny Rogers. Not surprisingly, the theme is taken from the lyrics: "You're the love of my life; you're my Lady."

Gambler—"for the man who leaves nothing to chance"—will also use the popular song in its largely tv and radio campaign.

Saatchi moves into Hong Kong

New York—Saatchi & Saatchi Compton has extended its operations to Hong Kong with its purchase of a majority share in Chase Compton Advertising Ltd. there.

Compton first acquired a minority interest in Chase 15 years ago. The Hong Kong agency now bills about $3 million and ranks 15th within the Crown Colony.

At the same time, Raymond Chao, the Chase founder, becomes chairman, and Peter Davies, formerly management supervisor, board member and member of the executive committee of Young & Rubicam, London, joins the Hong Kong agency as managing director-chief executive officer.

During the past month, Saatchi & Saatchi Compton reports, it has gained about $32.5 million in new business through its worldwide agency network.

Separately, Saatchi & Saatchi Compton signed an operational agreement with SGB agency in Rio de Janeiro.

SGB was until recently linked with Grey Advertising.#

Marcus to steer Herald Center

New York—Stanley Marcus, former chairman of Texas-based Neiman-Marcus, has a new assignment: As retail director, he'll help put together Herald Center, Manhattan's first seven-acre, 200-store, multilevel, theme retail center.

Slated to open in 1984, the center will cost an estimated $50 million and will be located in the now-empty Korvette Herald Square store, hard by two other renowned retailers, Macy's and Gimbels.

Developer New York Land Co. is owned by Victor Bernstein and is involved in other Manhattan restoration projects.

The new retail shopping center, 11 stories high, has been designed as a microcosm of New York, offering shoppers versions of such neighborhoods as Greenwich Village, Wall Street, Fifth Avenue, Broadway, Madison Avenue, Central Park, Radio City and the United Nations.#

Retailers say Santa late again

An Advertising Age roundup

The weekend after Thanksgiving buoyed some retailers around the U.S., but by the following Friday many stores found sales had once again dropped off, leaving one exec to observe, "Business will be very tedious until the last week before Christmas, and then it'll come on like a bull."

Some stores that relied heavily on promotions through November to stimulate sales say they will avoid them as December progresses. Not to sell at regular prices this month "would be harmful," said Gordon Cooke, senior vp-sales promotion of Bloomingdale's, New York.

Mr. Cooke said his store has scored recent gains of 10% to 15% but he cautioned, "The customer is still extremely volatile." Catalog sales, he added, "have not been up to expectations. We've still had increases but they're not the 50% to 75% gains we've seen over the last three years." One area that Bloomingdale's has aggressively promoted is home electronics, including Sony and JVC. "Sales are up 10 to 20 times last year's," Mr. Cooke said. But the store has taken anywhere from 20% to 65% off the list price. Many manufacturers have also been offering rebates on home electronics.

Another New York retail exec noted that although business was "very good the three days after Thanksgiving, it dropped off right after that and is now 5% to 8% off. For the month of November, New York stores had an average 5.3% increase against last year, with a mean inflation rate of 4%. But November was the best month the stores have had in three or four

Mouthwash market leader moves to protect its flank

W-L fights fluoride entries

By PAT SLOAN

Mouthwashes, like the bad breath they claim to fight, are stale. But a little fluoride may change that.

The $325 million-to-$350 million market, beset by declining unit sales, flat dollar volume maintained only through price increases, criticism from the Food & Drug Administration and competition from traditionally noncompetitive categories, is getting some needed resuscitation.

Warner-Lambert, the leading marketer in the category, is reacting to the current heavy introduction of ACT fluoride rinse by Johnson & Johnson by test marketing Listermint with fluoride.

W-L, which holds a 30% market share for its flagship brand, Listerine, and an 11% share for regular Listermint, officially calls its new item an extension. But sources indicate the new entry could become much more than that if the test proves out. "We don't know what will happen in test, but look north of the border and that will tell you what we have in mind," said one source, referring to Canada where the only Listermint in stores is that with fluoride in it.

The product is not being seen as another new flavor or new-color-tinted extension because W-L already has been forced to drop such a product, its cinnamon-flavored Listermint, from retail shelves, say retailers, who cite poor sales and tight competition for shelf space as the reasons.

Listermint with fluoride, being handled by William Esty Co., clearly can be read as a move to protect its flank from the possible inroads of the still nascent fluoride rinse market. While Colgate-Palmolive's older Fluorigard has achieved no better than a 3% share, competitors believe that J&J's new ACT anticavity fluoride rinse now being launched nationally (AA,

FTC, ad industry losers in AMA win

By RICHARD L. GORDON

Washington—Ad industry lobbyists are fearful that a stunning American Medical Assn. victory over the Federal Trade Commission last week has killed their own legislative program in Congress this year.

Rejecting White House support for the FTC and rebuffing extensive personal lobbying of Republican FTC chairman James C. Miller III, the House of Representatives approved an AMA-backed proposal that removes the multi-billion-dollar market for medical and other professional services from the reach of FTC's antitrust and consumer protection laws.

In the key vote, the AMA's House backers narrowly defeated a compromise that would have maintained FTC's jurisdiction over professionals. Observers now expect the Senate will not act on the bill this session.

At the same time, the House cut FTC spending ceilings in the bill reported by its energy and commerce committee to the lower levels recommended by President Reagan. FTC officials fear this may force the com-

Behind GF's daytime tv cuts

By CRAIG REISS

General Foods' decision to cut back its network daytime advertising during the first quarter of 1983 indicates that GF president Philip Smith is holding to a reported promise that brands showing little promise of spectacular results would no longer be backed by seemingly limitless amounts of ad dollars.

It also indicates that the nation's No. 3 advertiser will be accelerating its already active support of alternative media, as are other major tv advertisers disenchanted with network prices.

The action follows closely on the heels of a top-level meeting between Procter & Gamble, the top advertiser in the U.S., and the three networks, in which P&G

Heat turned up in granola bar market

By JANET NEIMAN

Having been beaten to the punch by Quaker Oats Co. in the "chewy" granola bar segment, General Mills—which virtually created the more than $200 million granola bar business—apparently is trying to head off additional losses by moving into the Midwest with Nature Valley Chewy granola bar.

That region just happens to be the latest ground for Quaker's rollout of its bar, which uses the name Chewy and which now will share that tag with General Mills.

The pending midwestern marketing battle could be the beginning of a new era for the category, which is rapidly shifting toward soft and chewy products that consumers favor over the hard, crunchy granola snacks. Industry analysts say the granola bar category is one of the few dry grocery categories still showing strong growth.

These two marketers are attracting competition from all sides, too. Carnation, Hershey, Keebler, M&M/Mars—all have products (or their eyes on products) that spell a greatly expanding market. Even Frito-Lay, with its original GrandMa's granola cookie line, can be considered competition.

■ Both General Mills and Quaker are prepared to fight it out with extremely heavy advertising and promotion programs for their respective Chewy bars. Quaker will back Chewy with a $20 million national advertising and promotion effort from AdCom, the company-owned agency; Nature Valley Chewy will be backed by a $17 million advertising and promotion effort from Campbell-Mithun that includes tv, direct-mail couponing drive, magazine and newspaper ads, beginning in February.

Quaker Chewy, still officially marketed only in eastern and western regions, is set for introduction in Quaker's central region (the upper Midwest) in January, but already is showing up in some cities. The product was originally introduced in the East and West (AA, June 1, '81), but was pulled from the East and put on allocation in the West later in the year because supply couldn't keep up with demand (AA, Nov. 30, '81). Certain original midwestern test markets, including St. Louis, retained Chewy on a nonallocative basis. Chewy re-entered the east-

Pan Am. You Can't Beat The Experience.

Low prices include new N.Y.-Florida route

Pan Am holds upper hand in latest fare-cut warfare

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

Pan American World Airways has pushed the airline industry into a fare war on various domestic routes and is in a position to dictate how deep the cuts will be and how long the battle for bodies will continue.

Industry sources speculated that the cuts will be deeper despite the fact that most of the major airlines raised fares 5% on most domestic routes late last week.

Pan Am's move to a $99 fare between New York and 17 cities, including seven Florida cities and on transcontinental flights, between Dec. 1 and Dec. 15 and Jan. 10 and Feb. 6, was matched by most major carriers, including Eastern, American (which does not have New York to Florida service), TWA and United.

Phone and fly

Pan Am said bookings for its flights topped 59,000 the day after its $99 fare was announced, breaking a one-day record for the airline.

Pan Am is in the process of increasing its capacity between New York and Florida, adding wide-body DC-10s and 747s. If those seats are not being filled after Feb. 6, sources said, the cuts are likely to continue.

■ "It's difficult to say how long the discounting will go on or how low it will go," said David Venz, a TWA spokesman. "We've quit predicting what might happen next week because more often than not it's just in response to some ridiculous fare another airline has set."

In fact, Pan Am already is offering fares lower than $99. In a joint promotion with American Express, the carrier is offering a 25% discount to 1.5 million American Express cardholders as part of Pan Am's WorldPass program. This would knock the fare down to $74.25. PeopleExpress already offers 17 nonstop flights to four Florida cities with its bottom, off-peak price set at $49 and top at $99.

"We have the lowest costs in the industry," said Steve Schlacter, advertising manager at PeopleExpress. "We can take it [fares] down to the nub and nobody else can."

James Burkart, an analyst at Charlotte, N.C.-based Interstate Securities, said Pan Am probably was looking at extremely low bookings during the periods the cuts were instituted. "It's a volume calculation on their part," Mr. Burkart said. "Pan Am seems to always be testing various strategies."

Continental Airlines moves account to Scali, McCabe, Sloves. . .Page 74.

William H. Dowse, senior vp advertising at Eastern Air Lines, said he believed the majority of Pan Am's increased capacity wouldn't be in place until the middle of December. "They are looking for a little bit of booking momentum before that time," he said.

One airline exec, who declined to be identified, was more blunt. "From all we hear, they are having a tremendous cash flow problem. This is a short-term move designed to raise cash. They're losing me-

New president

CBS taps Malara, Isacsson

By CRAIG REISS

New York—CBS-TV has tapped Anthony Malara to be network president and moved network sales chief Paul Isacsson to a new CBS Broadcast Group unit—Cable/CBG Enterprises—as its head.

Mr. Malara, 46, becomes the first president of the network since 1981, when his boss, James Rosenfield, relinquished the title in becoming broadcast group exec vp in charge of the CBS-TV network, CBS Entertainment and CBS Sports. For the past year, Mr. Malara had been the tv network's vp-general manager, a post that is now abolished.

Mr. Malara's appointment, while not totally unexpected, marks a change in recent routes to the presidency at the tv networks. Unlike Mr. Rosenfield and ABC's network president James Duffy, Mr. Malara does not come out of the sales end of the business. He joined CBS-TV four years ago from his native Watertown, N.Y., where during a 21-year career at WWNY-TV, a CBS affiliate, he rose to manager of

FTC tries salvaging food ad rule

WASHINGTON—In a final exchange of memos, the Federal Trade Commission's "old guard" staff collided with Reagan-era FTC consumer protection chief Tim Muris in a last-ditch effort to save the remains of their industrywide food ad rule.

The memos were made public last week in advance of a crucial commission meeting this Tuesday. Even the FTC ad regulation staffers writing in favor of the food ad regulation concede in their memo that "it is a close question as to whether this rule should be issued." And Mr. Muris, who earlier urged the rule making be scrapped (AA, June 14), was unmoved by the junior staff's final arguments.

He contends FTC has insufficient "hard" evidence that consumers are "injured" by energy and diet claims, that consumers actually misinterpret fat and cholesterol claims, that any "meaningful" definition for "natural" depends on the context of individual ads and that they are more likely to be harmed than helped if FTC discourages advertising from alluding to the diet/heart disease hypothesis.

FTC staff attorneys Melvin H. Orlans and Robert Cheek called Mr. Muris' demand for hard evidence "unduly stringent and inflexible" and said the proposed rule "should be viewed as our best possible effort to devise a reasonable and efficient solution to a number of difficult and pervasive problems which have plagued food advertising for years, and will undoubtedly continue to do so absent commission intervention."

The proposals before FTC are a drastically pruned-down version of a sweeping reform plan for food ads dating back to 1974. Major planks were jettisoned under the Michael Pertschuk administration, and further skepticism has emerged under Reagan era leadership since the current version was tentatively approved by FTC two years ago.

The proposal would regulate three general areas of food ad claims: Energy and diet claims; "natural" claims, and claims promoting a food's fat/cholesterol content or the "diet/health" hypothesis. The rule would limit the "natural" designation to foods that contain no artificial ingredients and are "minimally processed."#

BBDO stock soars; 2-for-1 split asked

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

NEW YORK—With Chrysler Corp.'s Dodge account restored to its client roster, BBDO International has seen its stock soar. Now it will see it split.

Last Aug. 24, BBDO stock was selling for $45.50 a share. Last Wednesday, it was up to $62.25.

Although the Dodge announcement wasn't issued until late October, for weeks it was considered a foregone conclusion (AA, Nov. 1).

BBDO directors voted to recommend an increase in the number of shares the corporation is authorized to issue, from 4.5 million to 10 million shares, and, if shareholders agree, split outstanding stock two-for-one in the form of a 100% stock dividend, payable to shareholders of record on Jan. 24. A special shareholders meeting to vote on the matter has been called for Jan. 19.

The board also announced plans to increase the quarterly dividend to 45¢ per share on post-split shares (equivalent to 90¢ per share on pre-split shares) effective with the April dividend. The quarterly dividend payable on Jan. 7 will be 85¢ per (pre-split) share.

Bruce Crawford, BBDO president, said the split should make the market price more attractive "and help broaden the ownership base."

"BBDO [stock] is a fabulous performer," said Steve Slawson, analyst at Bear, Sterns & Co., adding that he was pleased to see the board announce a dividend increase at the same time. According to his crystal ball, BBDO's earnings per share for 1982 will be $5.25, rising to $6.20 per share in 1983.#

Pink Panther branching out

TOLEDO—Come spring, the Pink Panther may be bounding about the commercial tv airwaves more often.

Owens-Corning Fiberglas, which has been featuring the character in its home insulation campaigns for several years, is now winding up a test of Pink Panther tv spots for its Fiberglas shingle line.

The company started testing the campaign last April in Boston, St. Louis, Hartford and Columbia, Mo., and is considering expanding the effort next year, according to Joseph Doherty, vp-marketing communications. The test spots from Ogilvy & Mather, New York, also used the Inspector Clousseau character for the first time.

In early 1983, Owens-Corning will promote its residential suspended ceiling line with the Pink Panther in another test, Mr. Doherty said. "The character has been successful for us, so we decided to experiment with these extensions," he added.#

ST. CLAIR SHORES, MICH.—Designer Depot, an off-price name brand apparel store, has been opened by K mart here (AA, Nov. 1). The Troy, Mich.-based retailer converted an old Kresge store for the test store. More Designer Depots will open near major metropolitan areas during 1983.

Thinking big, thinking internationally

Transnational planning takes the spotlight at center stage

By Herbert Zeltner

For most of us who work in American marketing and advertising, international activity has been intriguing and glamorous. It has also been pretty much on the periphery.

Transnational planning, creative and media work have usually been areas a select few have dealt with—those expatriates or long-distance commuters whose offshore concerns are segregated from our own more mundane domestic chores.

But a lot is happening now to the speed with which national boundaries are being broken down in matters of trade, selling and the placement of creative appeals around the globe.

Sounding Board

In a recent report, the Conference Board noted that fully 79% of all manufacturing jobs created in the U.S. between 1977 and 1980 were linked to exports. The board also said that 250 American manufacturing companies accounted for more than $500 billion in foreign sales in 1980 alone.

For the advertising world, the implications have been profound. Financial World magazine noted that advertising activity outside the U.S. had risen to 50% of a total of $110 billion in 1980 from 43% of a $35 billion total in 1970. Further, trade estimates suggest that by the end of this decade, total worldwide advertising will reach $300 billion, and by 1990 fully 54% will originate outside the U.S.

Source: Sounding Board survey, 1982

There's no denying that these dramatic trends are linked to some big changes in the advertising agency community. Consider the following:

- Young & Rubicam and Dentsu announce a merger of their Tokyo-based activities. They also agree to enter into joint ventures elsewhere in the world.
- Ted Bates buys a substantial minority interest in the fifth largest agency in Mexico.
- Saatchi & Saatchi, London, and Compton Advertising, New York, close a deal creating a new international agency with billings well in excess of $1.3 billion.

This is of growing interest to many executives throughout the advertising business. Thus, our current poll of the ADVERTISING AGE Editorial Sounding Board deals with transnational ownership of agencies, the impact of rapid "offshore" growth on American advertising and the ways in which our own practices may change as the balance shifts.

We asked this leadership group of key marketing and advertising executives at companies, large, medium and small, across the U.S. as well as agency management throughout the country where they stand in regard to some of these international issues. Among key matters where we probed for reactions and attitudes:

1. What trends are likely in both the direction and momentum of international trade, over-all and by sector, during the next several years?
2. What degree of autonomy should individual, single-nation agencies have in matters of creative strategy and execution to presumably maximize the effectiveness of selling efforts for their "foreign" clients?
3. How tight should control of marketing strategies and advertising execution be from headquarters to balance strong central direction with local creative vitality?
4. Are there important social and economic issues that need to be addressed as foreign ownership of major American advertising agencies increases (not to mention the more traditional pattern of American interests buying into foreign agencies)?

The responses we received demonstrate the tendency of American business to segregate international assignments, at least at the operating level. A significant number of Sounding Board members wrote to tell us they felt unqualified to answer questions in this area—they are, they said, simply not involved in "international."

"The most common misconception . . . is that creative strategy can be exported."
—James Schaefer

But more than 80 leaders in our business did answer—most of them with extensive comments and elaborations.

If any one word could describe the flavor of just about all the reactions we received, it is ambivalence. On the one hand, the overwhelming majority of Sounding Board responses acknowledged that we're finally headed toward a "one big world" economy that is bound to emphasize the importance of international selling and advertising in the years ahead. Yet, on the other hand, the responses suggest some hedging; some members wonder whether a wholesale drive for global marketing leadership by U.S. companies is really in the cards.

Much of this equivocation points to inconsistencies in preparing for long-run opportunities while dealing with some extraordinary short-run difficulties.

Looking toward the end of this decade, the great majority of respondents, from both companies and ad agencies, are quite bullish about the ability of Americans to sell aggressively throughout the world (and to support that effort with effective advertising emanating from the U.S.). But quite a few also caution that we're going through a period of intense difficulty and stress because of currency exchange headaches, increasing trade restrictions, pervasive and persistent worldwide recession and intensifying sales pressure from other regions. The majority of our panel believes that we'll have to be more alert to growing aggressiveness and skill from overseas—in advertising and in manufacturing—to try to maintain a leadership edge.

Yet, despite wide awareness of an increasing tide of foreign ownership of American enterprises—part of this tide now includes ad agencies as well—the agency executives don't seem to feel threatened. The attitude seems to be one of "they haven't landed yet"; the agency community isn't quite manning the barricades. At least, that's the reading right now.

Obviously, agency ownership of overseas facilities is lagging behind the internationalization of their own clients' business. If these agency executives' views can be taken at face value, we should see a great deal of agency merging, buying and branching across national boundaries over the next several years.

In short, the Sounding Board most emphatically accepts "internationalism" as a way of life for our business in the years ahead.

But this view is notably tempered by a "wait and see" attitude on the most effective way to adapt to a global village approach to marketing and advertising.

Now to the responses to some of the specific questions we posed:

1. What will be the trend for U.S. companies in percentage of sales, over-all, contributed by foreign markets during the balance of the 1980s?

A strong majority, 74% of the panel, agrees that foreign sales will increase in importance for U.S. companies through the decade.

The agency group of executives is even more inclined toward this view, with 84% expecting an increase in company sales from overseas interests.

Members of the Sounding Board point to several widespread factors serving to increase the proportion of foreign sales volume. Among them are more evident opportunities for business growth overseas and the maintenance of U.S. superiority in many categories of goods and services, particularly those involving high technology and fashion.

Adding impetus to this view is the improving economic vitality of many newer, developing markets around the world, coupled with the realization that many large companies will simply have to look overseas for their opportunities for further large-scale volume gains.

But there are some negative forces at work. Several Sounding Board members point out as drawbacks the dislocations of currency exchange risks and rapidly growing trade protectionism in the U.S. and elsewhere.

Says F. Beavin Ennis of Ennis Associates, Armonk, N.Y.: "The U.S. is still the master of information management, communication and industrial technology, which the whole world needs more of. Few countries can match our research and development facilities for developing new products."

"New markets are emerging for most consumer products, even with mature countries," adds Arthur E. Earley, chairman and chief executive officer of Meldrum & Fewsmith, Cleveland. "China, Africa, South America, the Far East all offer developing potential. The condition of the dollar will have an impact on how much of this increase [we realize]."

James Adler, president and managing director of Compton International, believes that the major multinationals will continue to push aggressively for growth. Their opportunities, he says, "are greater in absolute terms outside the U.S. than they are here. Also, companies not exporting will begin looking outside the U.S. as competition continues to tighten."

On the other hand, John F. Campbell, vp-public relations with Colt Industries, New York, sees some clouds on the horizon.

"I believe the increase will be modest as U.S. goods face increasing nationalism on the one hand, and on the other, increasing competition in terms of quality, price, design, technological innovation," he says.

Al Ries, chairman of Trout & Ries Advertising, New York, points to a further complication—the ability of government actions and policies to affect moves in this area. "In general, I think that political, not marketing considerations will have the most impact in international trade," he says. "If the U.S. passes restrictive trade legislation, other countries will retaliate."

When the question turned to expected growth rates of foreign sales for categories of goods, the panel sees a significantly dispersed pattern.

Presuming strong sales gains for American-made goods where fashion and advanced technology are involved, entertainment (motion pictures), soft drinks and personal care items all rank high among categories that will increase at a strong rate in foreign volume through the 1980s.

Not too surprisingly, travel, tourism and hospitality led the list in expected growth in international sales.

At the other end of the scale, in categories expected to hold at current levels or even decrease, are those troubled by already evident competitive inroads from abroad: Consumer audio/video products, clothing (including footwear) and, of course, automotive. Some respondents point out that the relatively high cost of American labor, as opposed to manpower costs overseas, affects this country's efforts adversely.

2. What about the reverse? What do you feel will be the over-all trend in the 9% of sales that foreign companies will enjoy by selling their products and services in the U.S. in the next several years?

When we turn to the other side of the coin—sales of foreign manufacturers and services in the U.S.—the panel is less emphatic on the growth of transnational business. Here, a lesser majority, approximately 60%, see an over-all increase of imports into the U.S. through the 1980s. A total of 27% believe that the current level of import activity will hold about the same. Presumably, the major inroads in U.S. share of market made by overseas producers may well slow down in the next few years.

"The nuances are critical. You have to know who you are trying to sell."
—Joseph Hoffman

Again, looking at this by category, we see travel, tourism and hospitality leading the list in expected increase of "import" activity. Following closely behind, in the view of the panel, are consumer audio/video products (the reverse of the view for U.S. exports), clothing and shoes and calculators and personal computers—this time for the mass market, as opposed to state-of-the-art technology advances at the upper end.

The panel believes that important reasons for continued foreign aggressiveness and share gains include perceived superiority in quality and design, lower cost production and a lack of effective U.S. competition in some newer consumer sectors (new home video forms, for instance).

In addition, the panel believes that the improvement in marketing skills and willingness to invest in exports among foreign interests will mean more sales in the U.S. through the decade, despite a recessionary economy, high dollar costs and a reawakened American marketing conscientiousness. The U.S., after all, is the largest single consumer market in the world for just about everything.

3. How significant is the extent of your own organization's involvement in marketing activities outside the U.S. (whether through an affiliate, subsidiary or the present company)?

When queried about their organization's state of international development, 61% of the advertiser respondents say their companies are significantly involved in overseas sales. In fact, these sales account for more than 20% of total revenue of their companies. A total of 13% indicate a high degree of foreign sales but at a somewhat lower level, above 10% of total revenue. This means that just less than three-quarters of all client representatives who responded to our poll are already experiencing significant offshore sales activity.

Further underscoring this internationalization of American business is the expectation by just about half the panel that their companies' proportion of transnational activity will be increasing even more over the next seven or eight years.

When agency management was asked about its involvement internationally, only a quarter of them say their own organizations are already significantly involved overseas—"significance" being defined as non-U.S. business accounting for more than 20% of total revenues. In contrast, 62% term their organizations' involvement in other countries as minimal (9% or less) or nonexistent.

What these figures suggest is that the client has apparently moved beyond the borders of the U.S. much earlier and more aggressively than have their agencies. But two-thirds of the agency executives responding to our poll expect their transnational activity to increase significantly through the balance of this decade.

As far as clients are concerned, those who see a great deal of further growth from overseas point to a range of new market opportunities and an increasing confidence of success in the international arena.

As the senior vp-marketing of a major leisure and recreation marketer says, "We have great new opportunities in Mexico, Latin America and the Far East, as well as expansion of an already strong European base."

"We [in the U.S.] are still the creators and leaders in this type of business."
—Richard Lawrence

On the less optimistic side, several advertiser company executives point to economic nationalism, as well as political and foreign exchange difficulties, as inhibiting the rate of further good growth in export. Typical is Colt Industries' John Campbell, who says: "The technology advantage that characterized the aggressive move overseas in the '50s and '60s is no longer present. There is growing nationalism overseas, particularly in Europe, particularly in France. Production capacity in the U.S., particularly in the basic industries, is shrinking sharply."

Many agencies anticipating major growth from overseas sources in the years ahead, respond in a variety of ways. Says C. James Schaefer, president of the DR Group, New York: "In 1982 we reopened our London office after many years because of increasing client urging for a direct response presence abroad."

4. Turning to transnational advertising, what do you feel is the most effective way to handle campaigns for American products in foreign markets?

To help the panel answer this question, we offered them four choices from which to select an optimum technique:

- Develop a domestic U.S. campaign that can be used almost anywhere with minimal change (i.e. language translation).
- Develop a basic U.S. creative strategy that can usually be used outside the U.S., but execution must be adopted locally for style, vernacular and custom.
- Develop all aspects of creative work from "scratch" in individual countries for maximum local effectiveness.
- Develop a strategy that depends on specific circumstances of the creative approach or product category involved.

Four out of ten members of the Sounding Board believe that the second choice, local adaptation of a basic U.S. creative strategy, would be the best approach. This proportion held equally both for the client and agency groups.

But the two sides depart noticeably over the other options. Twenty-nine per cent of the clients believe that creative work should be developed from the very beginning in individual countries. Only 19% of the agency executives agree. Interestingly, only two respondents in the entire panel believe that the U.S. campaign, translated locally, was the best way to go.

For many on both sides, the issue raised by this question consumes countless hours of heated discussion. Thus, it's no surprise that it triggered quite a few comments.

The senior vp-marketing of a multinational toy and game marketer, supporting the view that an American creative strategy should form the base of a plan and be adapted elsewhere, says: "Allowing for too much local control led to a fractionalization of product image, and positioning became a particular problem in Europe. Hence, our need was to have a single, worldwide creative strategy with local executions allowed. Also, much tv and print from one country winds up being distributed in another. This will be even more so with satellite tv gaining popularity throughout Europe."

Says William Biggs, president of William R. Biggs/Gilmore Associates, Kalamazoo, Mich.: "Too many overseas potential customers read U.S. publications. You must have one basic message worldwide with local adaptations."

In a different camp are those executives who believe that creative work doesn't travel well across national boundaries. Mr. Schaefer of the DR Group says: "The single most common misconception of new U.S. international marketers is that creative strategy can be exported. It seldom can, and the more complex it is, the less likely it will travel well."

Adds S. Joseph Hoffman, president of Ingalls Associates, Boston: "The nuances are critical. You have to know who you are trying to sell."

Still another point of view is the one that suggests that no one technique is always best. An exponent of that view is Reid Taube, assistant vp with U.S. Fidelity & Guaranty, Baltimore, who says, "It is possible to export U.S. campaigns, but my experience is that you probably sacrifice a lot in effectiveness in the process. My recommendation is to challenge the local agency to improve on the U.S. campaign . . . . If they can, you are way ahead. If they cannot, then you can move ahead with full confidence."

John O'Toole, chairman of Foote, Cone & Belding, New York, says: "It depends totally on the product and the marketing objectives. For cosmetics, liquor, etc., the strategy, idea and execution could remain the same in certain countries. Frequently, the idea must be changed while strategy is retained. Almost always the details of execution must be adapted to the local culture."

We then asked the panel whether there had been any recent changes in the way their own organizations operate. If any trend comes through here, it's a shift toward centralizing strategy and concept work wherever the client or coordinating agency has its headquarters. But the business of adaptation and execution still appears to be broadly dispersed among individual countries.

On the one hand, the Sounding Board members generally believe that centralization improves efficiency and control. On the other, they don't want to lose the vitality and effectiveness of fresh thinking and the local vernacular best gained by local operation of agencies.

In the final analysis, the panelists believe that the approach employed either already does or eventually will reflect the client's own structure and preference. And, ultimately, this decision will evolve from the client's experience and philosophy.

5. There are different schools of thought about the most effective handling of the various components of the advertising process in transnational marketing. What degree of headquarters control vs. local autonomy do you feel is best for each?

"Marketers and agencies have incentive for centralized direction."
—Arthur Early

Although the client group tends to favor more centralization than the agency representatives, a similar pattern emerges for both from the choices offered. There is a strong preference for headquarters direction and supervision in matters of budget and financial control and hammering out campaign strategy. More than 80% of the entire panel believes headquarters must give the marching orders in these areas.

But preferences shift markedly toward local autonomy and follow-through when we get to the implementation and data-gathering chores in advertising. These include creative execution, materials production, marketing and advertising research, media planning and buying, publicity, promotion and merchandising.

The single component about which the panel is somewhat equivocal is the matter of developing creative concepts. Here the panel split, with almost 40% preferring dispersed local organization of creative ideas and 60% believing headquarters should impose the basic creative direction worldwide.

Several panel members point out that there may not be a single clear-cut "best" way, that variations in the campaign, the nature of the selling effort and even the organization structure and working habits of the client all enter the picture.

Says Mr. Taube of USF&G Insurance: "Flexibility is crucial. If you have top-notch local management and a first-class agency, then you probably need to stay out of their way. But in some less developed nations, marketing savvy and crack agencies may be nonexistent, in which case you will want more headquarters control. in all cases, however, you need a graphic standards manual."

Mauri Edwards, vp-communications and creative services with Foster Grant, New York, takes the view that there are good arguments for strong control and local autonomy, but that compromise may be best. "Generally I'm not impressed with the notion of one-stop international shopping in advertising," he says. "The main reason is that local needs should and sometimes must predominate. It is a fact, of course, that not every area of the world is equally developed in advertising, and sometimes it becomes necessary to send advertising in from elsewhere. This is never desirable but sometimes the only way out. The result tends to have a somewhat patronizing aspect to it.

"On the other side of the coin, local advertising folk play the game, too. It is constantly argued that only an insider can do the job since knowing the turf is half the battle. There is obviously something to this argument but not nearly as much, I feel, as the locals make of it."

6. Regardless of the current situation, do you believe that transnational advertising activity will become more centralized or more localized in the future?

The panel was split on this question, with 30% seeing more centralized headquarters direction and control and 30% expecting a trend toward more autonomy in individual markets. The rest of the respondents see no particular trend either way, pointing out that individual circumstances will continue to direct a specific method of handling.

There is a dichotomy, however, when the views of the two sides are compared. The client group was a bit more emphatic in believing centralization is the direction in which we're heading; agency executives see the move toward localization as more likely.

Several reasons for expecting that centralization will become more common are well summarized by Arthur Earley of Meldrum & Fewsmith:

"Both marketers and agencies have a strong incentive toward more centralized direction and control worldwide. Cost containment and profitability on both parts are mandatory. Realistically, local autonomy is a strong disincentive to consistent strategies and to cost control. With the absorption of stronger independent local agencies by large multinational agencies, centralized direction and control worldwide becomes attainable."

The opposing belief focuses on the need to take advantage of the vitality and "hometown" know-how of indigenous creative talent.

7. Recent trade headlines report news of agency mergers and acquisitions across national boundaries. What are your own feelings about this phenomenon of national agencies under common, transnational ownership?

The reason for asking this question, aside from the greater frequency of transnational agency mergers and acquisitions today, was to see if the panel had any strong feelings either way about agency ownership crossing national borders.

A little less than half the panel (46%) sees it as a worthwhile development because it seems a way of assuring greater professional resources and better client coordination possibilities worldwide. If anything, client executives are more favorably disposed, with 54% of them agreeing.

But almost half the panel sees little or no significance, favorable or unfavorable, in the development as far as individual clients are concerned. Those who felt this way agree with the point that "companies will continue to pick local agencies or multinationals, whichever facility they prefer to work with."

Only about one in 20 of our respondents sees transnational ownership of advertising agencies as a negative development—something that could damage the vitality and creative contribution of smaller, local agencies. But the agency management segment of the Sounding Board shows a bit more concern than the client group.

Pursuing the matter a bit further, we referred to the highly publicized purchase by Saatchi & Saatchi, London, of Compton Advertising in New York. If transnational ownership of agencies was viewed as favorable or neutral, would this point of view hold even when it was overseas interests buying into the American market?

A bit less than one-third of the panel believes this type of development was a good thing, while six out of ten see no particular significance to it. Here again, as in the case of transnational ownership patterns regardless of direction, less than 10% see the move in a negative light.

Mr. Schaefer of the DR Group points out that the Saatchi & Saatchi/Compton development may simply be symptomatic of a larger economic trend. "Recent foreign ownership moves are part of inflow of foreign money to many industries due to high U.S. return on capital and dollar strength, largely resulting from high U.S. interest rates and moderating U.S. inflation relative to foreign economies," he says. "It has little to do with the advertising agency business per se."

Pointing out the other side, that potentially there are some negatives involved, is Richard Lawrence, president of Marketing Directions, Newport Beach. Cal.: "I personally don't like it where the markets are American. I think we know best what our markets require. We are still the creators and leaders of this type of business."

Bevin Ennis has another reason behind foreign agency purchases in the U.S. market: "Sophistication of the U.S. market really requires knowledgable U.S. managers operating virtually autonomously. The biggest advantage to foreign ownership is that the foreign agency can pick up U.S. accounts overseas."

Once again, though, the bottom line, as far as the Sounding Board is concerned, must take into account the matter of satisfying the client community. William Weilbacher, head of Bismark Consulting in New York, says it well:

"The basis of the advertising agency business is a satisfied client. Ownership of agencies must and will [evolve] in such a way as to satisfy clients."

8. Over the last two decades, there has been increasing comment about the professional marketing skills and creative strengths in advertising centers outside the U.S. Based upon your own general impression or actual experience, how strong do you believe these major markets are in the various components of the advertising business?

Many leaders in American marketing and advertising have pointed out the great strides being made in creative excellence outside the U.S. The point is underscored by poor American showings in recent worldwide advertising awards events. Our question was designed to get at how widely held this view is and whether it extends to other functions beyond creative and to other regions of the world.

Probably the most interesting point that comes through is not that the U.S. ad business has been left in the dust creatively, but that other markets are pulling even. Interestingly, a good number of our respondents point to rapid creative gains in Japan. But that country's standing still is not quite up to the degree of sophistication noted in the U.S., England and much of Western Europe.

The rationale offered by the Sounding Board for this changing standing centers on the observation that the advertising environment overseas is much less cluttered than in the U.S.—advertising there doesn't have to fight as hard to sell.

When we move beyond creative matters—to other aspects of the business, including marketing strategy, media planning and placement and advertising and marketing research—the panel generally believes there is still a demonstrable American pre-eminence. Individual panelists point out that overseas advertising is making important strides in these other disciplines, but that we still enjoy a higher level of expertise. The huge size of the American business and its much longer heritage as an established craft seem to account for this perceived leadership.

Because the momentum is with the "foreign" markets today, many panelists believe that the historically wide margin of American superiority will shrink noticeably over the next few years.

Says Jerry Keller, senior vp-director of the travel and trade division with Dailey & Associates, San Francisco: "British creative is exceptionally good. When one looks at Clio winners, they are frequently better than what you see in U.S."

Mr. Earley of Meldrum & Fewsmith says: "Marketing strategy and all the components that are a part of the process are probably more highly developed in the U.S. than elsewhere. Visual selling is a more highly refined art in certain European contries than in the U.S. Using entertainment and humor in selling messages is perhaps more highly developed in the United Kingdom."

Moving from the specifics of creativity and execution, we asked the Sounding Board to think about the entire matter of international marketing and advertising. How do the members feel about the role of advertising in multinational trade and the contribution it can make to national economics? Are gains in this arena inevitable? On balance, is it a good thing for American business? Individually, how might we take advantage of developments here? What lessons might we learn?

By an overwhelming majority, our respondents believe that the years ahead will see major growth in transnational marketing and advertising. They point out that selling in a global marketplace may well be one of the few ways left for mature American industries to build major new sales volume and revenue. They point to similarities in consumer needs and wants around the world, that homogenization of aspirations and taste is inevitable in a world of jet travel, satellite communication and increasing education. They believe that this, coupled with the expectation that consumer economics in all regions will soon move upward, is a powerful force for good for all business, both U.S. and foreign.

Joseph Hogan, president of J.P. Hogan & Co., Knoxville, Tenn., sums up the view by saying this:

"Human wants and needs are universal. They differ only in their degree of development. Pride, pleasure, profit, comfort, security and fear are international hot buttons. The language on the labels may vary—but the reactions do not."

But taking advantage of the mammoth opportunities offered in multinational marketing won't be easy or automatic, according to the executives.

The arrogance and provincialism that may have characterized American marketers and advertising people in the past, when they overwhelmingly dominated the business throughout the world, may be less and less appropriate.

Still, these thought leaders also point out that when we enter the world of multinational commerce there are many other forces at work—power complications in economics and politics helping to shape our moves. This larger frame of reference is noted by James Adler of Compton International in his comment that more international marketing and advertising is inevitable and good.

"We believe in free trade—or should—and transnational marketing is part and parcel of free trade," he says. "We can take advantage by fighting trade restrictions imposed by other countries and by our own government and by pushing for greater efforts by our government to stimulate exports."

And yet, as is mentioned by quite a few, there is much that American marketers and advertising professionals can be proud of as we move rapidly into a truly worldwide marketplace. After all, the U.S. advertising business has led the way for quite a while now.

FCB's John O'Toole wraps it up neatly by viewing what we know and do in advertising and marketing as an exportable skill in its own right.

"Marketing and advertising expertise is one of our most successful exports," he says. "Thus far, unlike automobiles and steel and electronics, American companies and advertising agencies have maintained leadership at home and abroad."

Tylenol tablets lead rebound

By NANCY GIGES

As the first Tylenol capsules in triple-protected packaging begin to appear on retail shelves, Tylenol tablets seem to have not only regained their prepoisoning market share but to have surpassed it.

Definitive results will not be available for months, but two "early warning" research services indicate strong gains for Johnson & Johnson's Tylenol, sold through its McNeil Consumer Products Co.

The rebound is taking place despite increasingly competitive advertising and promotion by rivals highlighting their own various attributes.

The most encouraging news for Tylenol comes from Information Resources' BehaviorScan Report that shows the company's tablets at a 29.9% market share for the week ending Nov. 2[illegible], even higher than the 22.2% held before the poisonings. The figures show other brands eroding as Tylenol gains.

Information Resources measures sales of a variety of products via retail scanner data in grocery outlets in Pittsfield, Mass.; Marion, Ind.; Eau Claire, Wis., and Midland, Tex. Although the sample base represents less than 1% of the population, George Garrick, senior vp-marketing and client service, noted that the data as a whole tend to be representative of national behavior. He pointed out that the primary value is in indicating trends and changes in market shares rather than absolute figures.

Some of the dramatic Tylenol share rise during the most recent week reported from 21.3% to 29.9% is likely due to the $2.50 coupon McNeil ran in thousands of newspapers recently to help consumers replace product they may have thrown away. Some 30% of purchases during week No. 9 (on the chart) were with coupons, although not necessarily the high-value ones, according to Mr. Garrick. However, J&J views the purchases as a positive sign even if they were with the high-value coupon.

Information from Nabscan Inc., another service that uses scanner data to develop share figures, also shows the Tylenol share on the rise. By the week ending Nov. 3, the Tylenol share was almost half of its prepoisoning

COMPETITION HURTS ATARI

Warner star fades fast

New York—The days of the entrepreneurial spirit at Warner Communications may finally be over.

A chain of events that culminated with last week's dive by Warner stock, caused by revised (downward) estimates for results of its high-flying Atari division, is leading many industry analysts to believe that management of the giant entertainment conglomerate will assert greater centralized control, abandoning the pioneering aura that has typified its activities to date.

Just short months ago, the videogame market and red-hot Atari were soaring. Today, closing in on the important Christmas selling season, the market has been hit with its first hint of disappointment. And Warner's profit surge, slowed by earlier announcements concerning its activities in cable tv and toys, and in its executive suites, has been caught in a downdraft.

Only two weeks ago, the chief executive of Warner Amex Cable Communications—a partially owned subsidiary that is having its problems—surprised the cable industry by announcing what was termed his mutually agreed upon resignation. Earlier in November, Warner, apparently seeking more cash and clout, sold off some of The Movie Channel, one of its cable tv programing services, to other-studio partners.

So when the word came last week that Christmas sales of Atari videogames would not be what had earlier been predicted, the entire industry was rocked. The New York Stock Exchange halted trading on both Warner and Mattel, severely hit by a surge in sell orders. Mattel then announced that its fourth quarter might show a loss due to increased videogame competition and a weak retail environment. Other names in the home video marketplace, from Coleco Industries to Commodore International to Tandy Corp., also were hurt.

Warner's startling statement was that Atari, the generator of glowing profits, was encountering "disappointing sales" of its game software—despite megabuck fourth-quarter tv and magazine spending—and that its coin-operated arcade games—a generally lackluster cate-

But FTC eyes Pepsi tactics

NAD rebukes 7UP for attack on Pepsi Free

By GAY JERVEY

New York—Moving with uncharacteristic speed, the National Advertising Division of the Council of Better Business Bureaus last week threw out Seven-Up Co.'s complaint that advertising for Pepsi Free is "false and deceptive," and also chastised Seven-Up for its "misuse" of the self-regulatory process by going public with its challenge.

The NAD's move comes on the heels of a Federal Trade Commission investigation of PepsiCo's equally combative behavior last March, when it threatened to punish its exclusive franchise bottlers if they cooperated with Seven-Up's suddenly health-conscious "no caffeine" campaign for 7UP.

Although the FTC has no comment, Advertising Age learned that on Nov. 15, the FTC, with a cover letter signed by Laurence B. Bernard of the Bureau of Competition, sent questionnaires to 464 Seven-Up bottlers, 150 of which carry both 7UP and Pepsi.

"The FTC is conducting an investigation to determine whether PepsiCo may have suppressed the advertising of a competitor by threatening independent bottlers. . ." Mr. Bernard wrote.

In the NAD/Seven-Up case, a Dec. 3 letter addressed to J. Stewart Bakula, Seven-Up vp-secretary and general counsel, NAD director Ronald Smithies said that after reviewing the materials sent to him—and simultaneously to 154 local Better Business Bureaus—the NAD saw no basis for investigation. Furthermore—and more significantly, perhaps—Mr. Smithies took Seven-Up to task for its methods.

"We have noted with concern," he wrote, "the use of an extensive promotional campaign publicizing your submission of the challenge to the NAD. With respect, I must express our view it is a misuse of the self-regulatory process to use it for promotional purposes. The designers of the NAD/NARB [National Advertising Review Board] mechanism were most careful to assure confidentiality to advertisers and complainants until the completion of the investigatory process. Their purpose was to guard against trial by publicity and to provide the proper setting for a true resolution of controversy."

Why does he feel Seven-Up's claims to be unfounded? "There are

Net censors worse: FTC aide

By RICHARD L. GORDON

Washington—Television network ad censors have been discovered by Federal Trade Commission consumer protection chief Timothy Muris, and he's not entirely pleased with what he's seen.

Speaking to an American Advertising Federation meeting last week, Mr. Muris said networks may be burdening advertisers by demanding more than the FTC would require, and that if this is so, it is conceivable the FTC might eventually want to issue a report expressing its concern.

One example he cited was from the tape of an ad industry presentation before the FTC which revealed that General Foods substantiated "tastes great" and "the goodness of pudding" claims for a frozen pudding snack in anticipation of network objections. Interrupting a vigorous defense of Reaganite ad regulation strategy to recount the incident, he expressed amused disbelief that advertisers should have to spend money substantiating subjective claims of this kind.

Earlier, Mr. Muris' attack on the "perceptions of our views of advertising" appeared to signal the start of a campaign by Republican FTC chairman James C. Miller III to more aggressively build support for his program with advertisers. Chairman Miller is expected to take up the same "myths" theme when he addresses the annual meeting of the National Advertising Review Board in New York this week.

The consumer protection bureau chief contended that there are only three issues dividing the Reagan FTC leadership and the advertising associations, and he listed eight issues where he claims the position of the Reaganites has been misrepresented.

The three issues where he acknowledges some differences involved Mr. Miller's opposition to the ad industry's pursuit of a complete exemption for ads from FTC's "fairness" jurisdiction; the ad industry's proposals for more stringent limits on FTC's deception jurisdiction than Mr. Miller has

Fast start for Time's cable book

By STUART J. ELLIOTT

New York—Though a rate card hasn't been published, Time Inc. already has commitments for more than 600 ad pages in TV-Cable Week, its weekly magazine due next spring.

"Honestly, we're very pleasantly surprised about the amount of support we're getting," said Jan Meyer, the new magazine's ad sales director. "We don't even have a way to process the orders."

The 600-plus figure is more than 2½ times the number of pages Time Inc. had commitments for at the launch of its most recent weekly before this. When People debuted in March, 1974, a corporate spokesman said, there were orders for about 225 ad pages.

Mr. Meyer attributed TV-Cable Week's impressive early page count to marketers recognizing Time Inc. is "deadly serious" about starting this publication for viewers of both cable and broadcast tv (AA, Aug. 23 et seq.). "They know we're spending $100 million," he added, a reference to the project's pretax startup costs.

It would "violate some confidences" to identify the advertisers involved, Mr. Meyer said, but the

Coen lowers ad volume forecast

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

New York—The past year has been worse than McCann-Erickson senior vp Robert Coen ever expected. As a result, Mr. Coen, recognized leader of the media ad spending forecasters, confessed last week that with the current economic uncertainty, he "can't tell what is going to happen in the next 12 months."

But that didn't keep him from trying.

In his 10th appearance before the annual Paine Webber Mitchell Hutchens media outlook conference, the agency executive predicted that advertising expenditures would reach $73.5 billion in 1983, a gain of 9.2% over 1982.

A year ago, Mr. Coen figured that 1982 ad spending would hit $68.5 billion, an 11.7% increase over 1981's total of $61.3 billion. Then, as the recession persisted, Mr. Coen revised his forecast downward and by June was predicting a 1982 media spending total of $68 billion, or 10.4% more than the '81 total. Last week he told the Paine Webber audience that 1982 was, after all, "a modest expansion year," and ad spending would come to $67.3 billion, an increase of only 9.5% over 1981.

Mr. Coen attributed the lowered ad spending total to the continued bad state of the economy. While network and spot tv and direct mail performed better than expected, print media revenue fell far short of expectations. And although national media fared better than he predicted, local media did not.

With inflation at 5% to 7%, with real growth between 2% and 4% and the gross national product up by 9%, according to Mr. Coen's mathematics advertising will again outpace the GNP. "For the past seven years, advertising has grown faster than the economy," he said.

However, many advertisers have hacked away at their ad budgets. For the past nine months, Mr. Coen noted, toiletries' ad spending was down 2% and wine was down 7%. The biggest spending gain, 112%, was by the marketers of radios, tv and stereo/hi-fi sets. The next biggest increase came from the pet food companies, up 36%. Automobile advertisers increased spending by 29%; soaps/cleaners 27%; airlines 26%; foods 19%, and drugs/remedies 3%.

Mr. Coen added that the increases in airline and automobile spending are economy-related, as the companies promoted their rebate programs to bolster faltering sales. "You can't expect those kind of big gains next year," Mr. Coen noted.

Making the ad dollar go further

New York—"Finding ways to get more impact from every [media] dollar invested is no longer a bonus; it's a necessity," J. William Wardell, group senior vp, Doyle Dane Bernbach International, told the Paine Webber media outlook audience here.

"And the answers," he said, "don't come from books or printouts. They come from challenging the routine, from asking, 'Why not?' and from an unwillingness to settle for what has been done before."

Some of Mr. Wardell's suggestions for "going the extra yard" in bringing creativity to media planning: Sponsoring and developing special programing; "roadblocking," or buying time to run simultaneously on the tv networks; trying special media to reach elusive audience segments; buying "special positioning" in traditional media to gain "extra impact"; creatively using catv and other alternative media, and relating adver-

Bic may add erasable line

By GAY JERVEY

After years of saying it wouldn't, Bic Pen Corp. reportedly will enter the erasable pen market next year, just in time for the bread-and-butter, back-to-school marketing push so critical to writing instrument sales.

Although Bic had no comment, it apparently is showing the pen to its key customers. Buyers for major national retail chains claim to have seen the product; other sources describe the industry as rife with rumors as to its arrival. One eastern buyer said she had an appointment with Bic this week, at which time she expects a sneak preview. Industry sources note that the major chains already are placing their fall orders, which would explain Bic's timing.

Analysts fully expect the Bic erasable—which, given Bic's nomenclature, just might be Product X's name—to get the company's heftiest new product introduction since the Bic Roller, introduced in 1980 to do battle with Pentel's popular Rolling Writer. That entry was introduced in the early 1970s and went on to create a new and very lucrative growth category.

As with erasables, Bic scrutinized Rolling Writer's performance before jumping in with its own version. Sources suggest that this is very much within Bic's corporate style. "Bic likes to watch the market carefully, see what it does and then come in late with a superior product they can produce at an efficient rate and at low manufacturing costs," an analyst said, adding, "one that's at a price the consumer will buy—i.e., pretty cheap."

As such, the Bic erasable probably will be priced quite competitively with the major entries from Gillette's Paper Mate division and the Atlanta-based Scripto Inc. It also is likely to be backed by big advertising dollars and merchandising promotions. Thus, Bic's entering the market is nothing to shrug off, and is being closely watched by competitors.

Analysts applaud Bic's decision and only hope the company isn't too late. For one thing, erasables represent the fastest-growing segment of the writing instruments market, with projected 1982 unit volume sales of about 150 million, according to one source. For another, the disposable ball-point or "stick" pen market—Bic's stronghold—has suffered during the current recession.

Milford, Conn.-based Bic also is shopping for a new agency for its estimated $15 million account and is expected to name a successor to Wells, Rich, Greene this month.#

CBS sees closer race with ABC

By DIANE MERMIGAS

Although CBS firmly leads the pack in prime time, its programing executives are contemplating major midseason changes. They want to be sure the network holds its ground through the spring, against stiff miniseries competition from ABC.

"I think we've done a little better so far this season than we thought we would. We also thought ABC would do better than it has," CBS program chief Bud Grant said in a telephone interview from his Los Angeles office.

CBS leads ABC season-to-date in prime time by 1.5 ratings and 2.5 share points. CBS finished only a fraction of a ratings point ahead of ABC last season.

"I think it will be a closer race between us toward the end of this season than it is now because of ABC's miniseries, 'The Winds of War' [Feb. 6-11 and 13] and 'The Thorn Birds' [tentatively set for March]," he said.

However, CBS will resist preempting as a

NBC delays 2nd-season moves

By JAMES P. FORKAN

New York—NBC-TV, which was to have juggled its prime time program roster late last week, suddenly decided to see how the rest of the 11th Nielsen ratings week went. In the meantime, NBC Entertainment president Brandon Tartikoff himself was renewed.

Amid some reports that at least one tv studio was wooing him (reportedly 20th Century-Fox), the 33-year-old Mr. Tartikoff signed what Raymond Timothy, group exec vp, National Broadcasting Co., would refer to only as a "long-term" contract. Grant Tinker, NBC chairman, said NBC still faced "a considerable program job" ahead and "it couldn't be in better hands" than Mr. Tartikoff's.

Mr. Tartikoff, who has headed the entertainment division since early 1980, and his cohorts are thought to have virtually given up on "Powers of Matthew Star," "Voyagers!" "Gavilan" and "Father Murphy" and gory—also was being hard hit.

Warner's bright star fades fast

That, Warner said, would translate into 1982 earnings "substantially below previous expectations." It revised earnings estimates for the fiscal year to $4 a share, when only days before it "led analysts to believe" $5.25 would be a likely figure, said Michele S. Preston, a Cyrus J. Lawrence analyst. "That's a significant shortfall in earnings," she fumed. "As far as credibility, the company has no credibility."

The news was accompanied by yet another bombshell: Perry Odak, president of the Atari consumer products division, had been "relieved" of duties. The news came right after the magnitude of Atari's overprojections became known, though the company denies the two are related. The rosy month-earlier report was made by chairman Steven J. Ross, saying at the time that retail demand for the videogame system and software had "increased substantially in both domestic and foreign markets" despite intensified competition (from Mattel and Coleco in hardware, from a number of companies in software—much of it made for Atari machines).

The trouble is that Atari's major Christmas releases, "Raiders of the Lost Ark," "E.T." and "RealSports," aren't coming on as blockbusters, a crushing blow to the optimistic forecast—and to Mr. Odak, since his inflated figures apparently were used by Mr. Ross in his embarrassing projections to analysts.

The heavy competition by competitive Atari-compatible games seems to be hurting the most. "We look on this more of a problem at Atari, rather than the whole industry going sour," said Ms. Preston. Home videogame cartridge sales in general are a bright spot in the Christmas season, according to such major retail chains as Sears, J.C. Penney and Toys "R" Us.

Even Warner's announcement last week noted that sales of Atari videogame consoles are holding up, staying within projections. Frank Mainero, marketing vp of Activision, a major marketer of cartridges that play on Atari units, said Atari's continued strong console sales reflect the industry's general vitality.

"But the marketplace has changed" in that game cartridges licensed from hit movies or coin-operated arcade games aren't automatic hits. "You can't use a license as a crutch anymore," he said. "Good game play is a must."

The long-running leader on the Billboard list of top-selling videogame cartridges is Activision's "Pitfall," an original game not adapted from a movie or arcade game. Atari had only three games in the most recent Billboard top 10: "Berzerk" at fourth, "Pac-Man" sixth and "E.T." ninth.

Warner's third-quarter financial report showed a 34% jump in net income to a record $78.9 million and an upsurge in revenues to $1 billion from $87[illegible].3 million. For the nine months through Sept. 30, WCI's income gained 49% to $224.8 million as revenues hit $2.9 billion, up from $2.2 billion—both records. Last week's announcement was that its final 1982 fiscal year earnings would only be 10% to 15% above the previous year.

Mr. Odak joined Atari only last February from Jovan Inc., the innovative cosmetics marketer that itself is no stranger to holding a hot marketing hand. Earlier, Atari's coin-operated division president and its home computer division president were replaced and some vps left in their wake. To signal a new commitment to marketing know-how, two top marketing execs from Polaroid, Theodore Voss and Peter Wensberg, were recently recruited by Atari to fill newly created marketing posts.

Another factor in the fourth-quarter downturn is a writeoff "in excess of $10 million after tax" on the sale of its Knickerbocker Toy unit. Warner, unable to get Knickerbocker to perform as well as hoped, has agreed in principle to a deal whereby Hasbro Industries would buy certain Knickerbocker inventory, assets and liabilities in exchange for which Warner would get 40% of Hasbro common stock (AA, Nov. 29).

The other negative that has emerged in recent weeks, in addition to the suddenly bleak videogame cartridge outlook and the considerable costs involved in Warner Amex Cable Communications and Warner Amex Satellite Entertainment, was the attempt—unsuccessful—by a federal prosecutor in New York to implicate Mr. Ross in a $170,000 slush fund overseen by Solomon Weiss, former assistant treasurer at Warner.

Mr. Ross "unequivocally" denied any "authorization or participation or knowledge of any secret cash fund" at Warner, following the initial charges that appeared in the press right after the Weiss trial opened in New York. Mr. Weiss was found guilty on fraud charges related to the now defunct Westchester Premier Theater, Tarrytown, N.Y., but nothing concrete surfaced in that trial on Mr. Ross' alleged role.

One analyst, Anthony Hoffman at A. G. Becker, assessed the company last week in these terms: "Warner Communications has been run as a very decentralized company. They tend to give their heads freedom to run the show. That's how Atari worked, and cable as well. Gus Hauser [the departed chief of Warner Amex Cable] was given the mandate to win franchises and was let loose to do that. But the company has had some very unhappy surprises, so you're seeing them pull in the reins and take more control over their subsidiaries. The period of decentralization at Warner is over."

(This entrepreneurial spirit at Warner—and the huge success of Atari—contributed to ADVERTISING AGE's selection of Mr. Ross as Adman of the Year for 1981.)

Cable tv happens to be a capital-intensive business. All participants, including Warner Amex, the Warner 50-50 joint venture with American Express, have always expected long-term returns. However, it is beginning to appear that those long-term returns will take a lot longer than was expected. This year, losses for Warner Amex are expected to be from $30 million and $40 million.

As for Qube, the 5-year-old interactive tv experiment in Columbus, O., mounted by Warner Amex, sources say it has been sustaining hefty losses. "It was their first hookup, and they just never got it together," said the cable source. And another cable source said Qube is suffering from management problems in Pittsburgh. One report has it that auditors are only now discovering irregularities in reports filed as far back as last February. "And that's systemwide, not just in Pittsburgh," said the source.

The bright spot among Warner Amex's programing ventures is MTV: Music Television. But despite being cited as the best example of cable narrowcasting by nearly every agency executive, MTV ad revenues fell significantly below projections. The infant network, expected to reach break-even by 1985, garnered only $5 million in ad sales in its first year.

By far the biggest drain on Warner Amex, however, are its numerous commitments to build multi-million-dollar, 100-plus channels, interactive cable systems in such urban markets as Dallas, Houston, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh and, tentatively, parts of New York City.

NOBODY BRIGHTENS UP YOUR CHRISTMAS LIKE ATARI

Cheery newspaper page ad for Atari pushes the company's broad line of game cartridges.

Building such systems is costing Warner Amex nearly 20% more than projected. At the same time, subscriber growth needed to offset financial losses has failed to meet expectations by about 20%, Mr. Hoffman pointed out.

■ The primary problem has been the lack of experience among all cable companies in building urban markets. Costs caused by regulatory delays, complex underground wiring and "greasing a few extra palms," were things nobody could have calculated, said Mr. Hoffman.

Warner Amex over the the past few years has been the envy of the cable industry as it succeeded in winning one after another of these big-city franchises. "Warner is not totally dumb, though," said Mr. Hoffman. "They know that to make sense of this business long term meant they had to bid big in order to win those markets. So they, probably like everyone bidding these markets, put in fudge factors to get their parent companies to give them the go-ahead." That's not to say today's losses will never be recouped. Whether they are and to what extent remains to be seen.#

This article was compiled from reports by AA's New York and Los Angeles bureaus.

Atari sues Coleco

SUNNYVALE, CAL.—While all the stock market activity was going on, Atari and Coleco Industries prepared for battle on another front.

Atari last week filed a $350 million suit against Coleco, charging patent infringement and unfair competition because of Coleco's expansion module No. 1, originally promised to the retail trade last February.

In the suit, filed in U.S. district court, northern district of Illinois, Atari claimed that the module (which allows ColecoVision set owners to play Atari-compatible cartridges) is "substantially identical to the motion object and sound circuitry of the Atari VCS."

Tylenol rebound continuing

level, and other brands appeared to be peaking.

Nabscan, formerly part of the Newspaper Advertising Bureau until it was sold, develops its figures from scanner data in 150 stores in over 20 cities.

At J&J, a spokesman said it is still too early to tell how fast Tylenol is recovering. He added that the company is back-ordered on capsules, and he does not know when factories can meet all orders.

The company has told financial analysts that it expects sales of Tylenol products to total about $275 million in 1983 in contrast to the $500 million that had been projected before seven people died in Chicago from taking poison-laced Tylenol capsules. Company officials told analysts that they expect to break even on Tylenol in 1983 and if sales are higher than anticipated they will simply pour those extra dollars back into advertising and promotion.

When that advertising will begin still has not been decided, a J&J spokesman said.

But the company will begin a three-day tv blitz in the Chicago market Dec. 13 featuring McNeil's medical director, Dr. Thomas Gates, to reintroduce Tylenol advertising into that market, where the product was banned from sale for almost two months. The spots are similar to those that ran elsewhere, in which Dr. Gates asked for consumers' continued trust. But they also make mention of the new triple protection provided by new Tylenol packaging. Compton Advertising, New York, is the Tylenol agency.

Although a regular campaign for Tylenol has not resumed, J&J has conducted a variety of promotional and publicity events to meet changing consumer concerns, and has taken a business-as-usual stance on most other flanker items in the Tylenol line.

But competitive action continues. Bristol-Myers, New York, told a group of financial analysts last week that it would not achieve its 15% annual growth rate because it plans to spend heavily to resume a leadership role in the analgesic market. Heavy spending will continue at least through the first quarter of 1983, the company said. B-M is putting a lot of dollars behind Datril 500, Excedrin and Bufferin (AA, Nov. 29). Also depressing earnings will be a reserve the company plans to set up to account for anticipated returns of drugs in packaging that is not tamper-resistant, one source noted.

In other new promotional developments, Sterling Drug is airing a new tv spot for Bayer aspirin pointing out that it "takes care in the way it packages its aspirin" just as it does in manufacturing it. An on-camera middle-aged spokesman says authoritatively, "At Bayer we've been using sealed tamper-resistant packages that meet even the new government standards and we've been doing that for over 25 years. Take Bayer the most trusted name in aspirin." The commercial by SSC&B also points out that the new coating on Bayer makes the tablets easy to swallow like capsules.

Until these spots appeared, Bayer maintained that it had no plans to change its promotional plans nor make any reference to the Tylenol incident because it did not believe it was appropriate.

A spokesman said last week that the company feels that the time has come for us to "assure our customers that we do take care. The market has settled down now and others out there are pointing out the steps they've taken to assure product integrity."

Sterling continues to maintain silence on whether it will once again try a nonaspirin entry despite its failure earlier. Sterling sells the leading extra-strength nonaspirin product in Great Britain under the name Panadol.

The Tylenol poisoning incident also has prompted Adria Laboratories, Columbus, O., to speed up introduction of a new product called Effercin, going into test in Cincinnati, Indianapolis, Charlotte, Louisville, Cleveland and Jacksonville and soon to be expanded to St. Petersburg, Tampa, Columbus, Nashville and Birmingham.

Effercin, a 500mg tablet of magnesium salicylate, is getting tv spots promoting "fast pain relief. . .contains no aspirin or acetaminophen." Advertising also points out that Effercin comes in "three-way tamper-resistant packaging." Agency is Martcom Inc., Columbus.

According to Richard Maradie, Effercin product manager, the company had planned to introduce the item in 1983, "but with the current situation, we moved up the release date."

Adria Labs, a joint venture of Hercules Inc., Wilmington, and Montedison, Milan, Italy, is best known for its anticancer drugs. It sells two other otcs, Modane laxative and Myoflex topical analgesic.#

Fear Anacin 3 tampering

NEW YORK—The latest in a rash of drug tamperings that followed the fatal Tylenol poisonings two months ago has hit American Home Products' Anacin 3 acetaminophen capsules.

AHP, whose Whitehall Laboratories markets Anacin 3, late last week sent one of its executives to California to investigate, although it believes the incident to be isolated.

A woman in San Jose was hospitalized Nov. 26 after becoming ill and was diagnosed as having suffered a stroke. Six days later, her husband turned over to authorities a bottle of Anacin 3 after noticing a strange odor. Tests confirmed that at least two of the capsules contained cyanide, but it is not known whether the woman took any of the capsules. A hospital spokesman listed her condition as stable.

AHP said that Anacin 3 advertising will continue, pending the outcome of the investigation.#

Super NOWs a problem

An Advertising Age roundup

Financial institutions were reassessing their marketing programs last week following the surprise approval of Super NOW accounts, which will be available Jan. 5.

The approval, coming on the heels of the Depository Institutions Deregulation Committee's approval of money market accounts for banks and savings & loans only two weeks earlier, caught the financial community unprepared. Most, still completing their marketing plans for the money market accounts that become effective tomorrow (AA, Nov. 22), had expected the Super NOW accounts to become available next spring, giving them time to initiate the money market accounts. (The accounts are being termed Super NOW accounts because, unlike the Negotiable Orders of Withdrawal, their interest rates have no ceilings.)

"This is completely changing the thrust of the thinking for marketers," said Charles Bartling, vp-director of communications for the Bank Marketing Assn. "The consumer information program is going to be a great challenge."

Said Elizabeth McMahon, vp-account supervisor at Bozell & Jacobs, Minneapolis, a member of the Bank Marketing Assn.'s advertising council, "A lot of institutions had planned a major effort" behind Dec. 14 money market accounts. "Suddenly, that's all changed."

Industry sources contend the Super NOWs, which allow institutions to offer unregulated interest rates on checking accounts with a balance of $2,500, are every bit as important as the money market accounts. Most agree that both will be offered by most institutions, with the money market accounts—which allow only six fund transfers per month—positioned as a savings instrument and the Super NOWs—with unlimited check-writing privileges—positioned as a checking instrument. The money market accounts probably will offer higher interest rates because they carry no institutional reserve requirement as do the Super NOWs. Existing NOW accounts have an interest ceiling of 5.25%.

Although not all industry executives are delighted by the prospect of the Super NOWs and money market accounts, they agree that the new products will almost have to be offered if an institution is to be competitive. "With all the competition we've seen emerging for these [new federally insured money market] accounts, I think it's a very good thing for the advertising industry, but not so much so for the banking industry," commented Charles Rand, vp-consumer marketing at San Francisco-based Bank of America, the nation's largest bank.

Some, like Mr. Bartling, believe Super NOWs will get at least as much advertising and promotion as the money market accounts, which in themselves were expected to create massive blitzes. But Tom Hefter, president of the Savings Institution Marketing Society of America, expects advertising and promotion of Super NOWs to be slower and less strenuous than for money market accounts. "It's hard to gear up and find money to spend to introduce two new products that close together," he said. Additionally, he believes institutions might wait to see what kind of internal money shifts (e.g., from passbooks and regular NOW accounts to money market accounts) and external shifts (from money market funds to money market accounts) take place before "adding another product to add to the cost of funds."

"I don't think most [savings associations] will have Super NOW accounts in place on Jan. 5," said Mr. Hefter. "I don't even think most of them will have money market accounts in place."

At Chicago's Continental Illinois National Bank, which began money market account advertising within 24 hours of its approval last month, Steve Arnold, vp-advertising director, said officials were meeting to determine how to deal with the new situation. "Nobody's going to pass up the Super NOW," he said. But he speculated that most institutions will expend most of their energy "concentrating on the [money market account] and worry about the other one later."

two factors primarily responsible for this decision," he wrote. "First, we note there is no serious controversy that the product can be accurately described as 99% caffeine-free. Indeed, I gather this statement is a conservative measure of the level of decaffeination. Second, in each example of Pepsi Free point-of-purchase material and advertising you provided, the company had included prominent indicators of the residual caffeine content of the regular Pepsi Free."

Mr. Smithies clearly was not amused that Seven-Up made its concerns known to not only the entire BBB network, but the media as well. In an interview last week, he termed such maneuvers as "highly unusual."

"I am still getting calls and letters from bureaus all over the country that are confused and don't quite know how to handle the situation," he said. "It could be quite a mess if you had 150-plus BBBs all beginning to take action on the same complaint."

He also indicated that this is the first time, in his memory, that a single complainant has written to the NAD, all local bureaus and the media—let alone done so before the matter could be judged.

In its request to NAD, Seven-Up cited a letter from Taylor Quinn, associate director for compliance in the Food & Drug Administration's Bureau of Foods. In a May 24 letter to counsel for Royal Crown Cola, which has several decaffeinated colas, he said that "to label a product containing even a very small amount of caffeine as 'caffeine-free' is unacceptable and is not in the best interest of consumers."

Last week, a Seven-Up spokesman hinted that the FDA might get futher into the admonishment act. Pressed to be more specific, he said, "Why don't you ask Mr. Quinn that?"

▪ Mr. Quinn said he had no knowledge of Seven-Up's latest move and added that as far as he knew, "Pepsi is doing it as we told them to, disclosing that they are not totally caffeine-free." When queried about the implications of Pepsi Free's name—a major bone of contention with Seven-Up—he said, "God only knows what a court would do with that. Usually the court looks at the whole label, not just a piece of it—i.e., the name." Cans of Pepsi Free quite noticeably contain the 99%-free disclosure.

In an official statement, Seven-Up expressed regret that it and the NAD do not agree that Pepsi-Free advertising is "false, misleading and deceptive" and added, "We will continue to bring to the attention of consumers situations such as this, in which we believe their best interests are being served."

With this in mind, Mr. Smithies and others call attention to advertising for Like, the Seven-Up decaffeinated cola introduced last April. Tag lined, "You don't need caffeine and neither does your cola," the tv ads do not loudly disclose that the product is 99%, rather than totally, caffeine free. "I think the ads should have a more positive disclosure of the fact that they are 99% caffeine free. Don't you?" he said. "By no means do I wish to imply that we are going after them, because I assure you we are not, but if somebody were to raise the issue. . . ."# chases, and misrepresenting both the prices paid for such time and the fair media value of the time.

Faberge alleges that the fraudulent practices were carried out between October, 1979, and last October by Ms. Porterfield, Mr. Wyman, Errol King—described as an officer and agent of PBU—and International Broadcast, a company headed by Mr. Wyman.

Faberge's complaint alleges that the defendants' use of "fraudulent invoices and schemes" netted them more than $3.5 million for "their own use." Should Faberge's allegations be upheld, the sum it is seeking would treble under federal law.

Faberge has reassigned the broadcast buying for products such as Brut and Touch of Class and Cellini colognes for men to Nadler & Larimer, which previously handled only print placement and creative. Faberge's ad spending in 1981 was nearly $8.3 million, of which $5.8 million went for network and spot tv, according to Leading National Advertisers.

Several calls to Mr. Wyman and Ms. Porterfield were not returned. Their answer to the allegations was expected to be filed with the court late last week.

In late October, Mr. Wyman and RDR Associates/TimeBuying Services reached a "confidential" settlement of a lengthy legal battle in which allegations of conspiracy, computer tampering, slander and unfair competition were leveled.

That legal battle erupted three years ago when Mr. Wyman, RDR's former chairman, sued RDR's board upon his return from a federal prison, where he served four months of a one-year sentence. He alleged that RDR's directors had issued additional shares in the company "for the purpose of diluting plaintiff's ownership interest in RDR." In setting up PBU, Mr. Wyman succeeded in taking CPC International and Faberge from RDR.

Mr. Wyman was jailed after pleading guilty to three counts of a 12-count indictment accusing him of conspiracy, mail fraud and misapplication of funds of an RDR client, REA Express, which went bankrupt in 1976.#

stalwart advertisers—the tobacco, toiletries and liquor companies. Mr. Coen said he expects to see some of those schedules restored, but wouldn't hazard a guess as to whether that restoration would come at midyear or yearend.

In the first nine months of 1982 vs. 1981, magazine ad page growth was up 1% compared with the 1981 ad page gain of 3%. The 1980 ad page total was flat. Mr. Coen said he is optimistic about magazines, believing they will start coming back with stronger schedules from alcoholic beverage and package goods companies. But he cautioned that the return may not be evident until 1984. For 1983, he said, page volume "at best" will show 1% growth.

National newspapers withstood serious cuts in schedules from tobacco companies (now that they have completed their low-tar product introductions) and in help-wanted ads. Cigarets were down 37% while help wanted was down 30%. Newspaper national linage growth was up a scant 2% in the first half of 1982, as compared to a 4% increase in 1981. Mr. Coen expects newspaper ad linage to be flat next year.

With soft retail sales, newspapers are continuing to suffer the aftereffects. In the first half of '82, retail linage was down 1%. In both 1980 and 1981, there was zero growth in the category. Retail sales "have been flat since 1978," Mr. Coen said, adding that he doesn't expect to see significant gains until late 1984.

Classified linage has continued to drop—"losses on top of losses," Mr. Coen said. By next spring, he expects real estate classifieds to have rebounded.

Other print, i.e., trade publications, will continue to do poorly until 1984, Mr. Coen said.

The surprise performer in the past year was direct mail (third-class bulk rate pieces), up 16% in 1982. In 1981 it was up 11.4%; in 1980 it was up 10.4%. He pointed to the mail's ability to deliver directly to specific audiences as one reason for its upsurge. He believes direct mail will remain up in 1983.

The substantial 22% gain in spot tv sales seen in the first quarter of '82 "doesn't look sustainable" to Mr. Coen. He noted rates were up 15% in the first quarter and 13% in the second quarter. "The stations are going to find collecting double-digit rates will be very difficult," Mr. Coen warned. He also noted that spot tv stations profited from the fact that network time became so hard to come by, forcing many advertisers into the major spot markets. In 1983, he predicted, spot tv and radio sales would be up 6% to 8%.

In spite of the 57-day professional football strike, the networks will register gains of 12% for the fall, and gains of 12% to 14% next year, according to Mr. Coen.

In 1983, Mr. Coen expects national broadcast to be up 11% to $13 billion; national print to $7.2 billion, and other national up 10% to $22.1 billion. Total national expenditures will be up 9.9% to $42.3 billion. But, forever the cautious optimist, Mr. Coen said: "By 1984, real expansion in the economy should be clearly under way. Pent-up consumer demand will be unleashed and there should be a strong surge again in advertising activity in all media."# proposed, and Mr. Muris' support for rotating warnings on cigaret packages and in cigaret advertising, which the ad industry is fighting in Congress.

In his myths versus reality remarks, Mr. Muris itemized and denied eight "misperceptions": That the Reagan FTC isn't doing anything; that it is confusing otherwise "clear" ad regulation standards; that it would allow lies in ads unless "economic injury" to consumers could be shown; that it would return advertising to the "law of the jungle"; that it has deviated from its own criteria for policing ads; that it would permit deception in advertising for cheap products, and that the ad industry opposes its regulatory proposals.

On network censors, the FTC official said "I have a feeling that the networks are asking you to substantiate claims that no one at the commission in the last decade would have questioned."

While he said no review of network practices is under way at FTC, he would not rule out the possibility that he might take on the networks in a public report if he thought advertisers were being required to "waste money."

▪ Speaking on the still-suspended National Assn. of Broadcasters code, AAF president Howard Bell, a former NAB code director, strongly supported self-regulation, saying "we can regulate ourselves more cheaply, effectively and efficiently than the government."#

English media vie for readers, ads

Wire, satellite speed news to information-hungry Asians

By Daniel Burstein

It is hard to find an English-language newspaper or magazine publisher who is not bullish on Southeast Asia. Real economic growth in the region has frequently soared above 10% in recent years; even taking into account the ripple effect imposed by depressed Western economies, countries like Singapore and Malaysia still forecast 6% to 8% growth for 1982.

Daniel Burstein is a free lance business writer based in New York, who frequently travels to Asia on assignment.

Adding to publishers' enthusiasm is the rapid spread of English as the region's common language and the development of local bases for international banking, trade and technology for which sophisticated business journalism is a necessity.

Other factors are a growing political identity that has fostered a demand for increased intra-Asian communication; a slow, but consistent, breakdown of traditional social patterns which has catapulted educated youth into a newly mobile and consuming middle class, and the lure of the potentially vast China trade, which continues to bring foreign businesses into Asia in search of a foothold.

And satellite technology has made it all possible. In October, for example, the International Herald Tribune, already publishing from Europe via satellite in Hong Kong, added a Singapore satellite edition. The Asian Wall Street Journal, Time and Newsweek have also been able to greatly speed their publication schedules and coordinate more complex demographic mixes through the use of satellites.

Three decades ago the English language press in Southeast Asia was confined to local papers for the expatriate community and the distribution of news magazines to servicemen. But today it has exploded into a thriving marketplace of diverse media options, with a host of American, British, Australian and Asian entrepreneurs locked in a struggle for readers, visibility and ad dollars.

Asiaweek's view may be the most Asian, with regular features on rural areas.

"Over the next five years a lot of Asian magazines will disappear," predicts Charles Stolbach, publisher of the Hong Kong-based Far Eastern Economic Review. "They won't be able to stand the increasing levels of professionalism we're now witnessing in the Asian media."

Peter Harper, advertising director of the Asian Wall Street Journal, concurs: "The market out here may not be as big as some people hope. After all, it doesn't take very long in Asia to go through the elite of a society and get down to people who just simply don't make very much money."

English-language publishing in Southeast Asia—a region generally defined as the five countries of the ASEAN alliance (Indonesia, Malaysia, Philippines, Singapore and Thailand) plus Hong Kong—exists on many different levels. In terms of circulation and visibility, the top tier is made up of Time, Newsweek and Reader's Digest, each of which publishes editions in Asia that largely resemble the domestic books, but with a small portion of editorial tailored to Asian readers.

and the American view of world events, while Reader's Digest audiences are similarly fascinated with U.S. life styles, but the publication is geared more for the mass market. All three offer advertisers a variety of demographic packages in the area and circulation bases in the hundreds of thousands.

Also combining established editorial packages with Asian advertising splits are the more recent arrivals, Business Week International, The Economist and the International Herald Tribune.

At the other end of the spectrum are newspapers and magazines wholly produced in the region, designed to serve either local readers, trade sectors or highly specialized business audiences. English-language dailies exist in all the Southeast Asian markets, ranging from the Bangkok Post to the New Straits Times in Kuala Lumpur.

The greatest proliferation of titles has come in specialized books, many of which are controlled circulation. Asian Money Manager, Asian Banking, Asian Finance, Insight and Young Asian Executive are all designed to reach small, elite audiences of financial executives and are distributed in many Asian capitals.

FEER, an East/West hybrid, is "the bible" to Westerners working in Asia.

Singapore has its own business daily, the Business Times, and most of the countries have four-color business monthlies—Business in Thailand and Business in Malaysia, among others.

New computer magazines geared to products and applications in the Asian market are also springing up (Asian Computer Monthly, Computer-Asia). The Hong Kong-based South China Morning Post group, meanwhile, has been aggressive in bringing diverse English-language books onto the market, ranging from Asia Magazine (a biweekly Sunday color supplement inserted into English-language dailies throughout the region) to Asian versions of Golf Digest and Boating Monthly. Even China has the China Daily, a semi-official digest of Chinese news and opinions printed in Peking and Hong Kong and sped by jet in small quantities to ASEAN capitals.

But it is the truly regional publications—the ones produced in the region, with editorial concerns and paid circulations throughout the continent—whose growth and development reflect the true coming of age of print media in Southeast Asia.

The leaders in this group are the Far Eastern Economic Review, Asiaweek and Asian Wall Street Journal. Here's a rundown of their activities.

- Far Eastern Economic Review. "FEER is the bible," says a western diplomat based in Bangkok. "I can't imagine trying to work in business, government or the media in Asia without reading it religiously." Indeed, recent subscriber studies show that FEER readers are zealously loyal and place high confidence in the weekly's journalistic content.

Established just after World War II, FEER is now a joint venture of Dow Jones & Co. and the South China Morning Post group. In the last four years it has experienced a growth in paid circulation of almost 20,000 to more than 56,000 today.

With bureaus in 27 cities and a largely Asian audience, FEER offers the most comprehensive weekly look at Asia. The front half of the magazine is devoted to major political news; the back of the book provides detailed financial information on national economies, industries, investment strategies and markets.

Since many of its journalists are Anglo-Saxons and many readers Westerners, FEER is admittedly a hybrid of East and West. Like some of its major Western counterparts, FEER strives to make political sense out of obscure and esoteric events as well as offer incisive financial writing on issues like property prices in Singapore, Malaysian raw material cartels and the progress of Sino-American joint ventures in China's Special Economic Zones.

With its focus on Asia itself, FEER is not directly competing with Time and Newsweek, says editor Derek Davies. The advent of the Asian Wall Street Journal in 1976, however, "jerked us out of our complacency," he adds.

Publisher Charles Stolbach believes that FEER and the Asian Wall Street Journal are complementary rather than competitive, since "the more professional media we get in Asia, the greater the benefit"—a view undoubtedly shared by Dow Jones, which has a financial interest in both.

Explaining the success of English-language publishing, Mr. Stolbach notes: "Affluent people in Asia are tied together by the English language. They need first-rate information, but the local press in each country tends to be highly controlled, with tv even more restrictive."

While it is not well known outside of Asia (U.S. circulation is a scant 6,000), FEER's writers include a who's who of experts on the region. Its prestige is such that normally reclusive heads of state and financiers will make themselves available to FEER when they are unavailable to others.

"We've trebled advertising revenue during the worst recessive years in the West, growing by 700 ad pages," says Mr. Stolbach. "That says something about us and the potential of this region." But, he warns, what was once a wide-open game is becoming more restrictive: "In a few more years there will be few opportunities for publications that aren't up to top international standards."

- Asiaweek. In many ways the antithesis of FEER, Asiaweek was begun by a group of FEER writers and editors who broke away in 1975, believing there was a need for a magazine that more explicitly promoted Asian viewpoints and personnel.

"In the next five years, a lot of Asian magazines will disappear, unable to stand the increasing professionalism."

While Asiaweek considers itself more authentically Asian than FEER, its editor is a New Zealander—Michael O'Neill—and its ownership is primarily American (Reader's Digest now holds an 80% interest).

The magazine is a general-interest newsweekly with regular space devoted to politics, economics, life styles, social trends, culture, science, sports and intellectual debates in Asia. Mr. O'Neill is particularly proud of the recent addition of a weekly section called "The Heartland," which features stories about life in Asia's vast rural locales.

He has developed a network of stringers in 100 Asian towns of less than 50,000 population, and points to the potentially vast market for a magazine that speaks to the concerns of these people. "After a few years of developing correspondents among local doctors, school teachers and other English-speaking intellectuals in towns and villages, we ought to know more than anyone about what's really happening in Asia," says Mr. O'Neill.

He sees the magazine's audience as Asians concerned with comparing life and problems in their countries with those of others in Asia. "When Time and Newsweek write about Asia," he says, "they try to show how 'exotic' it is, while FEER writes almost exclusively about major political and economic issues. But we are talking about issues like religion and education—which simply have never been covered."

Considering that big advertising dollars in Asian magazines are generated by airlines, banks, alcohol, tobacco and office products, how interested are such advertisers likely to be in a magazine that places so much emphasis on readers outside big cities where consumer dollars are concentrated?

Very interested, argues Gregory Jaffray, Asiaweek's chief executive officer and a recent arrival from Reader's Digest headquarters in Pleasantville, N.Y.

By addressing the issues that underlie Asian life today, he says, the magazine will find a large audience among urban intellectuals, businessmen and government workers. In fact, Asiaweek has grown from a circulation of 24,000 to 35,000 since RD came in three years ago.

Veteran observers of Hong Kong publishing think Asiaweek is still searching for its identity. It was born, they say, in the mid-1970s when anti-American sentiment was strong in Southeast Asia and must now reorient itself toward a less ideological and more pragmatic epoch. On the other hand, the regional cohesion it long advocated has been given a boost by the development of the ASEAN alliance and the new emphasis on East-West relationships.

- Asian Wall Street Journal. After suffering extensive losses since founding AWSJ in 1976, Dow Jones turned the corner this year and began to show a small profit on a circulation that has pushed ahead of the 25,000 originally planned for the publication. Similar in appearance to the U.S. Wall Street Journal, AWSJ draws to a large extent on the American daily and the resources of AP-Dow Jones for news and financial data on the U.S. and other world economies. But in covering Asia (with 17 fulltime correspondents), AWSJ has found that the hunger for solid reporting on business affairs is insatiable.

"The success of our operation is not only because Asia is a buoyant place," says managing editor Mike Malloy, "but also because it is becoming a genuine region." Companies are expanding their activities here with such speed that up-to-date information about conditions in all Asian markets has become a vital necessity, he notes, especially to the AWSJ reader who has an average income of $75,000.

Aside from the daily presentation of stock market quotes, currency exchange rates and commodity prices from all the Asian and world trading floors, AWSJ presents a steady diet of detailed news on Asia's major corporations and industries. But it has also gained considerable prestige from its investigative reports in the last year.

A report last summer, for example, by Barry Wain on inhuman conditions faced by Vietnamese refugees in Thailand became such a cause celebre that correspondent Wain was expelled by Thai authorities. The incident only served to enhance the paper's stature, however, since the measures taken against Mr. Wain were seen as punishment for having told the truth.

Most recently, a five-part article investigating connections between the Central Intelligence Agency and the failed Nugan-Hand Bank in Australia succeeded in raising eyebrows all over the world.

There is a suspicion in AWSJ's Hong Kong office that the paper's success was the motivation behind the International Herald Tribune's decision to move into Southeast Asia. Mr. Harper says bluntly: "The IHT is in Asia because of us. They said in the early 1970s that you couldn't attract the advertising transfers from the U.S., but we showed it could be done. We show how to use satellite transmissions to get effective daily circulation—now they're following the trend we set."

While the thinking at AWSJ holds that the region can support both dailies (since one is Atlantic-oriented and other Pacific-oriented), some recent issues of AWSJ may well be designed to head IHT off at the pass. More space has been turned over to nonbusiness subjects like travel, the arts and leisure activities, and the feature pages increasingly resemble IHT's weekend pages.

Neither Mr. Harper nor Mr. Malloy expect circulation to grow rapidly. AWSJ already has 7% of the daily English-language market in Hong Kong, compared with only 3% of the daily newspaper market for the Wall Street Journal in key U.S. cities. "How much more can we grow?" asks Mr. Malloy rhetorically.

They both foresee, however, heightened interest from an advertising viewpoint in the quality of audience delivered, especially as readership statistics improve and it becomes easier to sift out the facts about who various publications are and are not reaching in Southeast Asia. ■

Japan's Real Decision Makers–

Their Daily Newspaper Is The Asahi Shimbun.

You've probably heard or read a lot about the unique decision-making process in Japanese organizations, and maybe you're even a little confused about what really goes on. While a lot of attention has been given to the "how", little has been paid to the "who". Put simply, the Japanese decision-making process starts from the bottom and moves toward the top. At the Section or lowest level, problems are identified, proposals are made and the initiative is taken. Among Section workers, morale is high, energy and enthusiasm are common, and the willingness to work long and hard is taken for granted.
As the facts clearly show, their newspaper of choice is the Asahi Shimbun. Published twice daily in Japan's major commercial and population centers, backed-up by several combined area editions, and having a large nation-wide readership, the Asahi Shimbun is a quality newspaper which reaches the people who count. If your need is to inform or persuade Japan's decision makers, then let the Asahi Shimbun carry your message to the source.

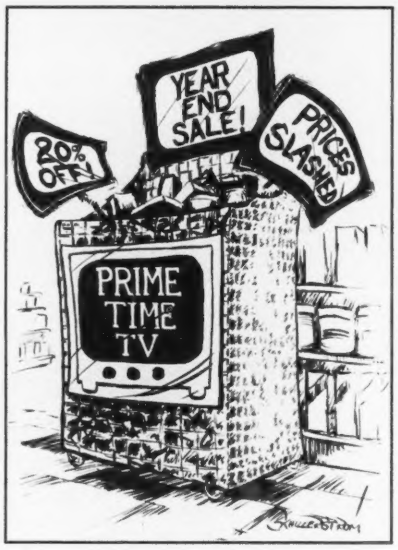
Tv buyers say nets dumping yearend spots

By CRAIG REISS

No distressed merchandise, networks reply; blame rumors on buyers embarrassed by nets' success.



New York—Major network tv buyers at advertising agencies across the country report that disastrous fourth-quarter prime time scatter sales at the three nets have led to unusually drastic price cuts and combination package offers.

The reports have drawn strong denials from the tv networks. Some network sources have labeled the reports a weak attempt by media agents to strike back at network strategies that increased cost-per-thousand rates by as much as 16%, and allowed CBS to cease giving guarantees against demographic deliveries. These agency buyers are described by the network people as having been embarrassed by the networks' successes in this year's upfront selling season.

Nevertheless, agency sources maintain that network salesmen have been offering price cuts of as much as 50%. While the networks are not offering two-for-one deals, sources say that prime time buys in the final two weeks of this year are being offered with "bonus spots," or free exposures in top-rated programing. "There is so much prime time available, you can shoot a cannon through it," said one source.

Some reports place the three tv networks with as many as 350 unsold 30-second prime time availabilities through the end of the year and into the first quarter of 1983. If that is true, the networks would be down in sales for the quarter by as much as $15 million.

Sources at CBS and ABC, while conceding that post-holiday sales have been weaker than previous years, called the reports of unsold prime time ludicrous and impossible to substantiate, since the networks do not advise each other of the size of their unsold inventories. "If the marketplace is so bad," said a network exec, "why are all three networks going to report record revenues this year?"

The period between the week before Christmas and the New Year, traditionally slow for the network sales crews, has earned a special designation: Holiday price period or h-period pricing. Prices normally come down during this two-week period.

Network sources said that advertisers with fiscal years ending Dec. 31, who normally jump into the market to take advantage of h-period pricing, have not come forward this year. Attributing this to the failure of the economy to turn around during the quarter, they add that even in the best years this additional spending amounts to only a few hundred thousand dollars for each net-

$100 million shop set by Y&R, Dentsu

New York—The 18-month-old joint venture between the two largest agencies in the world, Dentsu and Young & Rubicam, has spawned a U.S. offshoot, Young & Rubicam/Dentsu, with offices in New York and Los Angeles.

Sources say the worldwide joint venture, which officially bows Jan. 1, has sights on other locations shortly, and the ones mentioned most often are Asia and Europe.

The new company, owned 50-50 by the parent companies, combines Y&R's Los Angeles office with Dentsu Corp. of America and enables Y&R to claim a share of Dentsu's $100 million in U.S. billings.

Dentsu accounts that now become clients of Y&R/Dentsu are Canon USA, Japan Air Lines, Mikimoto (America) Co., Monex International, Nissin Foods (USA), Shiseido Cosmetics (America) and U.S. Suzuki Motor Corp.

Y&R's Los Angeles office accounts that now become part of Y&R/Dentsu are Sanyo Electric, Security Pacific Bank, Twentieth Century-Fox Television and United Vintners (Inglenook and Colony wines).

Managing the new agency is an executive committee consisting of Sid Marshall, exec vp, Y&R's Los Angeles office; Akio Minamoto, president of Dentsu Corp. of America, and Burton Vaupen, Y&R's senior finance and administrative officer. In the new venture, Mr. Marshall becomes chairman-chief executive officer; Mr. Minamoto becomes president, and Mr. Vaupen will serve as exec vp-chief administrative officer.

Over-all, Y&R executives are managing the U.S. and Malaysia

'7-Eleven'll sell tickets when agents sell milk'

Airlines ground CAB's ruling on ticket outlets

By RICHARD KREISMAN

The Civil Aeronautics Board's competitive marketing case, three years in the making, is turning into a gunfight where the gunslingers won't show up.

Last week, the board lifted travel agents' exclusive rights to sell airline tickets and opened the field to a host of potential competitors ranging from large retailers like Sears to computerized ticketing companies such as Ticketron (AA, Dec. 13).

But to do that, the airlines have to sell their seats to the potential vendors, and so far the nation's airlines aren't taking the board up on its new offer.

Given the precarious state of the industry, observers say the airlines won't authorize new ticketing agents because they fear reprisals from travel agents. So the travel retailing scene is expected to remain the same despite this, one of the final deregulatory acts of the board.

"A 7-Eleven will sell airline tickets when travel agents sell milk," said Tom Volz, vp-marketing, Southwest Airlines, Dallas. "With the volatility of prices, new services and schedules, the average passenger is relying on travel agents for information. Perhaps, if the atmosphere in the industry were different, someone would take a chance. But I just don't think that's going to happen."

The first stage of the CAB order calls for the immediate repeal of travel agents' exclusivity for "on-line" or single-carrier ticket sales. "Interline" tickets—multicarrier tickets—are not affected by the new order until January, 1985, when travel agents lose their rights to act as the airlines' sole ticket sellers. Airlines then will appoint their own authorized agents to market tickets.

In addition to the exclusivity issue, the board resolved that agencies and the Air Traffic Conference, the travel agents' accrediting organization, will lose all antitrust immunity by January, 1985. The Area Settle-

Ross Roy/N.Y. joins Rumrill-Hoyt

Saatchis link two units of Compton

By PAT SLOAN

New York—The Compton Communications subsidiaries of Ross Roy/Compton-New York and Rumrill-Hoyt, New York and Rochester, will be merged into one agency, Rumrill-Hoyt, as of Jan. 3.

The announcement last week followed a statement made earlier by Kenneth Gill, chairman of the Saatchi & Saatchi group, which owns Compton, to the effect that three money-losing Compton Advertising subsidiaries would be merged or sold. At the time, Mr. Gill identified the Denmark shop as being divested. He also mentioned Hoffman York & Compton, Minneapolis, which will be closed effective Dec. 31 and not sold as reported earlier (AA, Dec. 13).

The forthcoming merger involves the third agency not earlier identified by Mr. Gill. Compton chairman Milton Gossett admitted that Rumrill-Hoyt, New York, which billed about $57 million at the end of 1981, lost money this year, while Ross Roy, billing about $24 million, had been flat.

Earlier in the day, Al Molinaro, Compton Group president, acknowledged that the recession had put "some pressures on some members of the [Compton] group." But he maintained that the merger offers clear-cut benefits and was being planned well before the Saatchi/Compton marriage. "Both agencies would have projected a profitable 1983 if this merger had not occurred," he added. Calling the two agencies "mirror images of each other" and noting that they have competed head to head for new accounts in the past, Mr. Molinaro said the merger will create one larger and stronger organization "to better meet the needs of clients." Gary Landis, previously president of Ross Roy/Compton-New York and now president-chief executive of the new agency, added that the merger, by converting two midsize agencies into a large agency, will make Rumrill-Hoyt able "to compete with any agency in the city."

In addition to Mr. Landis' new title,

DDB opens up to cigarets, gets PM brand

By JOHN J. O'CONNOR

New York—Philip Morris U.S.A. has assigned the $5 million-to-$10 million Parliament account to Doyle Dane Bernbach, whose policy against accepting cigaret business was largely enforced by the late William Bernbach while he was running the agency.

DDB thus becomes the tobacco company's third agency, joining Wells, Rich, Greene and Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, which is giving up Parliament.

In explaining the policy change at DDB, pr director Cary Bayer said the agency's position on accepting a cigaret account actually had begun to change last April during merger talks with Foote, Cone & Belding, whose major client is Lorillard, the nation's fifth-largest cigaret maker. Mr. Bayer said Mr. Bernbach indicated that, despite his feelings, he would not have objected to Lorillard as a client had that merger gone through.

Furthermore, Mr. Bernbach was said to have then told Neil Austrian, president-chief executive officer, DDB International, that since Mr. Austrian was responsible for day-to-day operations, he should decide which accounts to accept or reject. The DDB founder and advertising legend died Oct. 2.

- A memo from Mr. Austrian to the agency's staff explaining the policy change noted, "based on the strong desire of many of our people to handle a tobacco account, and the opportunity to work with a professional marketing company of the highest order offering excellent future growth opportunities, DDB has decided to enter into a partnership with Philip Morris."

James J. Morgan, exec vp-marketing, PM U.S.A., said that PM, whose business continues to boom, had been seeking a third agency for the past three years. Mr. Morgan said the current Parliament ads by Burnett are among some of the best that have supported the brand, but explained that "a new client-agency relationship is best served by working together on an actively marketed and established product.

"DDB will be absolutely under no pressure" to top Burnett's work when it takes over the account Jan. 1, Mr. Morgan stressed. He noted that it was far more important for DDB to learn the business so that it can be positioned for new product assignments down the road.

Parliament, one of PM's lesser brands, has been on a long-term decline. It had estimated unit sales of 6.93 billion units, a 2.9% drop from 1981, according to analyst John C. Maxwell Jr. Burnett's major PM brands include No. 1-selling Marlboro, Merit and Virginia Slims. WRG has Benson & Hedges.#

TO OUR READERS:

Starting with this week's issue, the regional news pages of Advertising Age have a new, more distinctive look.

We have created this new format to emphasize our ongoing interest in bringing to you all of the significant news of people, events and trends on the local and regional media, agency and marketing scenes. The redesign of the regional pages will permit us to carry more stories, utilizing the resources of an expanding and upgraded national network of local correspondents, as well as reports filed by Ad Age's six domestic news bureaus. Our regional coverage is under the direction of Nancy Millman, Chicago bureau chief and regional editor, and Lisa Wells, recently appointed assistant regional editor.

For a look at our new look, which includes distinctive logos for the East, Midwest, South and West regions, turn to Page 24. We hope you like it.

Miles tries Healthgard vitamins

By JENNIFER ALTER

Miles Laboratories, the long-time king of the advertised vitamin business with its One-A-Day brand, at last is acknowledging the presence of natural vitamins.

The Elkhart, Ind.-based company is about to move into a Seattle market test with a midprice natural vitamin line called Healthgard. The 65-unit line includes products in seven vitamin groups: C, A&D, E, minerals, B complex, multiples and food supplements. Healthgard, which retailers are being asked to take on in entirety, will be displayed in self-standing "vitamin centers."

Miles salespeople are asking retailers to locate the "vitamin center" in the health food rather than the vitamin sections of their stores, so as to take advantage of traffic from those already interested in natural products.

The technical difference between natural and synthetic (most branded products are synthetic) vitamins is not entirely clear. Some vitamins are very difficult to produce with all natural ingredients.

Healthgard currently is being shipped to retailers. Advertising, originally scheduled for Jan. 1, has

Ad-supported cable wins in royalty ruling

By SUSAN SPILLMAN

New York—New advertiser-supported cable networks that have been struggling to increase their subscriber bases over the past year suddenly are gaining hundreds of thousands of subscribers.

The almost overnight boom is the result of cable operators nationwide adopting these networks as replacements for distant-broadcast signals and superstations they are dropping due to the prohibitive expense a recent copyright ruling imposes on continuing their carriage.

Cable pioneer and superstation owner Ted Turner persuaded Congress to push back from Jan. 1 to March 15 the date when hefty royalties begin, and there's a chance the decision could be overturned on appeal. But many cable operators aren't waiting. They are rushing to add new services that limited channel space previously prevented them from carrying.

"While the importation of the most popular distant signals will continue to have a place, there is no question the copyright situation is rapidly accelerating the growth of ad-supported, cable-originated programing," said Bob Alter, president of the Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau.

The Cable Health Network has added between 500,000 and 750,000 new subscribers in the past month due to systems dropping broadcast signals and superstations and adding CHN, Jeffrey Reiss, president of CHN, estimated. Moreover, he added, "We expect to add a total of 1 million new subscribers by the end of December, which will put us over our yearend projections by at least 500,000 subscribers."

"The copyright decision has certainly accelerated our growth rate," concurred Doug Holliday, director of marketing for The Weather Channel. Like CHN, he said, The Weather Channel has grown by hundreds of thousands of new subscribers in the past two months, substantially more than in other months. In fact, between September and December of this year, the network increased its subscriber base by 1.6 million, although not all of that can be attributed to the copyright decision.

■ Satellite News Channel and MTV: Music Television also report growth spurts. But Jordan Rost, vp-sales for MTV and Nickelodeon, added that the demise of CBS Cable is responsible for opening up channels as well. Mr. Rost attributed the gain of 1 million subscribers for both services over the past couple of months directly to the termination of CBS Cable.

The National Cable Television Assn. is seeking a court action to overturn the U.S. Copyright Tribunal's recent decision to impose new rates next year that would cost cable operators more than $20 million in royalty payments. But cable

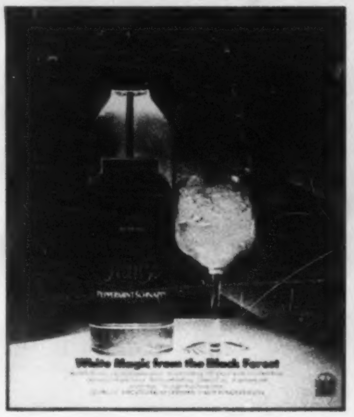
W.V. Elliott: "Americans talk dry but drink sweet."



Liquor entrepreneur finds niche between the giants

By JOHN J. O'CONNOR

New Britain, Conn.—It takes a special talent to develop for the contemporary American palate wines and liqueurs that convey an impression of having been produced with love and care for centuries in places such as Germany's Black Forest or the Italian Alps.

Three years ago, Rumple Minze 100-proof peppermint schnapps, Schnapple apple liqueur, Melano Cappuccino liqueur and Spritzen sparkling wine were just concepts in the mind of William V. Elliott. Today they are among the brands that are helping to spur the growth of W.V. Elliott Co., a multi-million-dollar enterprise that the former Heublein vp-marketing started out of a briefcase in 1979.

"I'm not putting anything over on the marketing and sales pros in this industry, nor am I selling to them," said the 51-year-old marketing man as he guided a visitor on a tour of a onetime warehouse with a tired exterior that belied the Old World charm of the modern office complex within. "Marketing is my milieu," he said as he walked through a frigid, dingy section of the building where he plans to install a two-tiered, glass-encased office wing. "I'm practicing my art by trying to give the consumer the feeling he wants to have," continued the man whose obsession for products and surroundings bespeaks his credo: Heritage, quality and integrity.

While his success to date is small when measured against the volume of giants such as Seagram or Heublein, it has not gone unnoticed. Mr. Elliott has received numerous partnership or buyout offers from other spirits companies. The deal he expects to make involves the sale in a matter of weeks of a minority interest in his company to a major British spirits conglomerate.

"This is not a total economic venture," Mr. Elliott said. "I love this business. I understand this business. When I was at Heublein, I didn't have an ounce of confidence in myself. But I do now."

At Heublein, he was responsible for such innovative products as Boggs cranberry liqueur, Yukon Jack liqueur and Malcolm Hereford Cows, a 1 million-case seller in 1976, its first year on the market. Cows faltered badly after his departure in 1978.

One of the convictions Mr. Elliott brings to the development of a new product is that "Americans talk dry but drink sweet." And Mr. Elliott, in working with drink chemists abroad, has sought to respond to that craving for sweetness.

"When you come right down to it, there aren't that many spirits products that taste good," he said,

What price yule sales?

New York—As the saying goes, all things are relative. And major retailers were, with some exceptions, relatively optimistic during the final countdown before Christmas.

What they will face now is the question of whether heavy pre-Christmas price reductions will cut into traditional January sales.

Most stores around the country expected a late-shopping surge to produce at best single-digit gains ranging anywhere from 2% to 7% for the Christmas season. While some others were claiming to be on the brink of double-digit gains, a smaller number were actually funereal.

One retail specialist with one of the Big 8 accounting firms denigrated the more upbeat projections as sheer fantasy, described the season as a "disaster" and estimated that 1982 retail sales would be down 10% from 1981 and, in some cases, down by as much as 30%.

Morgan Stanley retail specialist Walter Loeb disagreed, however, and took a positive view of the Christmas period late last week. "I believe stores will report 6% to 7% sales gains for December, although I have some reservations even at this last moment." His conditional reply reflected a fear that even with the extra shopping day before Christmas, and with many companies shut down, their workers would spend those free hours away from home, but not in the stores.

Mr. Loeb also cautioned that his projections would not apply to certain areas of the country which remain weak: Southern Texas,

Ad industry loses struggle for reforms

FTC gets full budget; Senate kills AMA rider

WASHINGTON—The Federal Trade Commission sailed through the budget process last week, emerging with its 1983 funds intact and a smashing victory over the American Medical Assn.

With the support of a newly formed core of conservative Republican senators, the FTC turned back the well-funded AMA drive for an amendment that would have put trade practices of all licensed professions beyond FTC's reach.

In the budget bill that finally reached the White House, the FTC will have $63 million for 1983, up $3 million from President Reagan's budget recommendation, and will operate with no changes in its authority beyond the restrictions that have applied under the 1982 appropriations bill.

When the dust settled, all the struggling over legislation putting new restrictions on the FTC led to a dead end and will have to be refought in next year's more moderate Congress. While the money bill retains a congressional veto and series of temporary restrictions on rule-making procedures, it does not touch the important revisions in FTC's power over unfair and deceptive trade practices, which chairman James Miller has been promoting.

It also represents a "dry hole" for ad industry associations that have staged an uphill struggle to persuade Congress to eliminate FTC power to police advertising on an unfair standard. This, along with numerous procedural reforms that ad associations consider important, had been included in legislation reported by the Senate commerce committee, but this legislation failed to reach the floor for debate.

Chairman Miller had staked out a strong stand in defense of FTC's authority over trade practices of doctors and other professionals, insisting that there should be no privileged occupations that are exempt from marketplace laws that apply to others. He celebrated the success and was photographed with a handwritten sign "We Won" tacked on his office door.

The AMA, which is credited with almost $2.5 million in campaign contributions, had prevailed in the House, which voted complete exemption from the FTC for licensed professions. But in a showdown Senate roll call, a new group of conservative Republicans led by Sen. Warren Rudman (R., Vt.) prevailed with a substitute that left FTC's vital power over

Was station pressured to refuse show?

CBS: We didn't 'Nick' Mobil

By CRAIG REISS

NEW YORK—An accusation by a Mobil Corp. official that CBS-TV had taken unspecified actions to persuade its tv affiliate in Flint, Mich., not to carry Mobil Showcase Network's "The Life and Adventures of Nicholas Nickleby" in January, drew an angry response from CBS. It called the Mobil statement a shallow publicity gimmick.

In a telegram to CBS Broadcast Group president Gene Jankowski, Mobil Corp. vp-public affairs Herb Schmertz said, "I am deeply saddened by reports I have received of CBS' actions to dissuade CBS affiliates from running 'Nicholas Nickleby.' While these efforts generally have met with failure, it appears that the residents of Flint and Saginaw, Mich., are going to be denied the opportunity to see 'Nicholas Nickleby' as a result of actions taken by station WEYI, the CBS affiliate in Flint."

The telegram did not elaborate on the alleged CBS actions, nor would Mobil officials comment further on it. The telegram was released to the press before reaching CBS headquarters.

Mobil says it plans no deep cuts in its 1983 ad budget—Page 23.

Mobil, which owns the rights to the tv adaptation of the Broadway play, has syndicated the nine-hour program through SFM Media Service Corp. to 60 markets, including five CBS affiliated stations, nine ABC stations and 10 NBC affiliates. The program runs during prime time on four consecutive nights beginning Jan. 10.

Tony Malara, president of CBS-TV Network, called Mr. Schmertz' telegram "a blatant publicity move by Mobil that is both obvious and shallow. What we did was do our job in affiliate relations."

Mr. Malara challenged Mobil to make specific charges against the network.

While conceding that preemptions of network programing by affiliates has increased with the growing number of programing sources, Mr. Malara said "Nicholas Nickleby" had been offered to the network before going into syndication, but was turned down because

Among the products whose advertising awareness changed most in the latest monthly national poll, only Tylenol scored a gain. Consumers in the poll are asked which ad in various categories (medicine & drugs, soft drinks, etc.) first comes to mind.

Public awareness of Tylenol's ads zoomed in Nov.

By JOSEPH M. WINSKI

Awareness of Tylenol advertising soared following its "You can trust us" commercials, which aired simultaneously on all three tv networks several weeks after the Tylenol poisonings, according to adWatch, a monthly survey of consumer awareness of advertising.

Of 1,253 consumers asked last month to name the medicine & drug advertising that first came to mind, 25.7% said Tylenol, up from 16.6% in October. Tylenol's November score was its highest since adWatch began last April. Its increase of 9.1 percentage points was well above the 2.8 points required for statistical significance and also was the largest of any advertiser mentioned by consumers last month.

AdWatch, a joint project of ADVERTISING AGE and SRI Research Center Inc., Lincoln, Neb., each month asks a random sample of consumers to name the advertising that first comes to mind of all ads seen or heard in the previous 30 days in each of 20 product categories. Tylenol has led every month in medicine & drugs, but its November margin of nearly 5 to 1 over runner-up Anacin was by far its largest yet. Anacin was named by 5.5% of the consumers questioned, down a statistically significant three points from October.

Tylenol's score had dropped significantly in October, in the wake of Johnson & Johnson's decision to stop all Tylenol advertising after seven deaths in the Chicago area were traced to cyanide-laced Tylenol capsules.

The November survey was conducted by telephone from Nov. 1 through Nov. 21. A week before the polling began, Johnson & Johnson ran 60-second commercials at the same time on all three networks. In those spots, the medical director for McNeil Consumer Products, the Johnson & Johnson subsidiary that makes Tylenol, reminded viewers of the 20 years of trust established by Tylenol and said that his company would do all it could to regain that trust. The commercials ran a total of 14 times from Oct. 24 through Oct. 27.

Beginning Nov. 21, the company also ran newspaper ads offering $2.50 coupons for the purchase of Tylenol products, but Johnson & Johnson hasn't resumed regular product advertising for Tylenol capsules or tablets.

The high visibility of the "trust us" tv spots is further supported by the 80% of those mentioning Tylenol ads who cited tv as the source, versus 13% who said newspapers and 5% who said magazines. In October, 59% of those naming Tylenol said they saw the ad on tv, while 23% cited newspaper ads and 13% magazine ads.

Tylenol also finished No. 3 in November in top-of-mind awareness of all advertising (not limited to a particular category), behind Coca-Cola and Burger King.

In a press conference last month, James E. Burke, Johnson & Johnson chairman, said the tv commercials were contributing to a rebuilding of consumer confidence in Tylenol (AA, Nov. 15). Subsequent figures indicated that Tylenol's food store share of the analgesic market (all from Tylenol tablets, since the capsules weren't being sold) had bounced back to 29.9% from 6.5% the week after the poisonings (AA, Dec. 13). Before the poisonings, Tylenol capsules and tablets combined had a 46.7% share of the entire analgesic market.

Competitor reaction to Tylenol's difficulties is reflected in the appearance of Anacin-3, a nonaspirin analgesic like Tylenol, among the top three in medicine & drug advertising awareness for the first time in November. Anacin-3 advertising was mentioned by 3.4% of the consumers surveyed. American Home Products, maker of Anacin-3, is believed to have been the first Tylenol competitor to step up ad-

Sara Lee reacts, tries basketful of new sweets...

By JANET NEIMAN

DEERFIELD, ILL.—Many product categories have been experiencing economy-driven changes that blur the lines between once-distinct product segments as consumers trade down or substitute products.

The sweet goods category is one example of how economic conditions expand product categories and force into competition marketers that might never have battled for market share.

Kitchens of Sara Lee, still the leader in the frozen baked sweet goods category, has suffered as a result of unit volume declines that reflect such an expansion of the market. Like the products of other sweet goods marketers, consumption of Sara Lee products also has been eroded by the "fitness trend" and new competition from fresh goods marketers—Entenmann's, in particular. While Sara Lee, a unit of Consolidated Foods Corp., never lost much of its share in the frozen baked sweet goods arena (it now hovers around 40%), unit volume was sluggish and its strength in the baked sweet goods category as a whole had diminished.

"The sweet goods category includes mixes, store-delivered items and in-store bakery goods" along with frozen products, noted Richard Sharoff, vp-retail marketing at Sara Lee, in a recent interview at the company's headquarters. Today, he said, the homemade segment is major competition. "What we want to do is offer products in ready-to-eat form that offer options to that, and we see opportunities in that area."

Sara Lee officials were not always so collected about unit volume losses. Attempting to stem them, the company last year tested fresh baked goods in Chattanooga and Nashville in cooperation with Dallas-based Campbell-Taggart (now a subsidiary of Anheuser-Busch), which distributed the products (AA, Sept. 14, '81). P. Frederick Kahn, senior vp of Consolidated Foods' frozen sweet goods group and chief executive officer of Sara Lee, now calls the experiment "a little test that probably got more notice than it deserved."

The project, he said candidly, "was hastily conceived and it didn't prove much. At the time, we were concerned about turning around our retail business, but I have confidence that we can get the [frozen] category to grow" exclusive of a fresh baked goods approach.

The attempt was so faulty that, although neither executive would rule out the possibility of Sara Lee reentering the fresh baked goods arena at some time in the future, they expressed strong doubts about it. "I have a hard time seeing how we ever could compete in the [fresh baked goods] business profitably," Mr. Kahn said.

■ Now, Sara Lee's emphasis is on unit volume, rather than market share. "Sara Lee has always succeeded in increasing its market share," Mr. Kahn said.

Mr. Kahn and Mr. Sharoff pinpointed new products and more aggressive consumer advertising programs as the means to reverse the unit volume damage. Consumers seem to be responding. After reporting continued unit volume declines for fiscal 1982, ended July 3, the company, with fiscal '82 sales of about $330 million, "stabilized" sales during the first six months of calendar 1982, and had sales increases during the last half. The second-half figure includes an estimated 7% increase in case sales for the last quarter of calendar 1982 over the same period last year.

Sara Lee has never been a slouch in the realm of product development, even though the company didn't even have a new product development department as recently as a year ago. Rather, the company has proven itself prescient of food trends. However, apparently unable to find the niches to satisfy both itself and its consumer base, it has been forced to back down from many new products only to watch later entries in other categories follow up on its instincts with great success.

It pegged the smaller household, diet-conscious and convenience goods movements quite early, for instance, and unsuccessfully entered Sara Lee Cakes for Two, Sara Lee Light 'n Luscious and Sara Lee frozen entrees. (Sales of Cakes for Two turned out to be "tradeoff" sales in which consumers bought the smaller products rather than the original sizes, "at a price disadvantage," Mr. Sharoff said.)

The company is hoping such mistakes won't occur under its current set of new product criteria, and with a new product development unit established this year.

New Sara Lee products now must meet consumer needs by entering "potential growth markets"; broaden Sara Lee's participation in the frozen baked goods category; be "outstanding products," and represent products "the competition couldn't copy easily, if ever."

During 1982, Sara Lee introduced such new products as Puddin' in-the Middle, New York Style Cheese Cake and a reformulated line of coffee cakes. (Puddin' in-the Middle has been a stellar performer, and the company recently announced it would extend the original four-item line to six, with the addition of lemon cake-lemon pudding and banana cake-banana pudding items.)

Mr. Kahn and Mr. Sharoff say the company is deemphasizing line extensions and moving instead toward new categories.

One thing Sara Lee is concerned with is giving more attention to the consumer, in terms of marketing as well as consumer need. "We're investing heavily in marketing programs, with the focus of advertising increasingly [on] consumers." Declining ingredients costs have made that effort easier, he noted.

Early in the year, the company, via agency Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, broke two campaigns: A tv and print effort supporting the repackaged line of layer cakes themed, "What's your Sara Lee fantasy," and a testimonial tv drive for coffee cakes directly striking at Entenmann's (AA, Feb. 15). Although a spokeswoman at the time referred to the advertising as "choreographed", the two campaigns in fact were highly detached; Mr. Sharoff admitted in the interview that the "fantasy" campaign was a "false start" that was run only because the company "had already committed" to it.

Midyear, Sara Lee introduced Puddin' in-the Middle with a tv spot stressing the real pudding in every bite, and through the year continued its earlier "bake sale" and "cake break" promotions and backed the reformulated, repackaged coffee cakes with print couponing and rebates.

This year's efforts provide a good contrast with the past few years, when consumer advertising dwindled to almost nothing (Mr. Sharoff now says it "wasn't what it should have been") and trade promotion was intensified. In '82, Sara Lee ran five flights of three to five weeks of tv, which, in his words, is "heavier than it's been" in years and "not too bad for a company that hasn't had any."#

. . .And first out is croissant debut

DEERFIELD, ILL.—In what Kitchens of Sara Lee officials say could be the biggest new product introduction in its history, the company will begin marketing a three-item line of Sara Lee croissants nationally in February (AA, Dec. 6).

The line, including all-butter, wheat 'n honey and cheese-flavored croissants (if you can't speak French, say "kwa-sawn"), has been in development for about a year, and Sara Lee executives P. Frederick Kahn and Richard Sharoff claim it garnered the highest ratings in consumer testing of any Sara Lee product in history.

It will face retailer Vie de France, the only national marketer of fresh French croissants, as its primary competition. The company, with 19 retail bakeries and several fast-food restaurant outlets, sells 1 million croissants per week, and expects to produce a million per day by 1985.

Sara Lee also will probably be competing with an old foe, Campbell Soup Co.'s Pepperidge Farm, which is now testing a line of fresh-baked croissants in Portland, Me. Butter and walnut, almond and chocolate-filled Pepperidge Farm croissants are available in Portland, and could be introduced in Boston this winter as the first phase of a rollout to the northeastern region.

Sara Lee's Mr. Sharoff said the target audience of its new product is "anyone who eats croissants. It's the [traditional] Sara Lee user: The slightly more affluent consumer in major metropolitan markets."

The new croissants utilize the "laminated dough" process already used for Sara Lee danish, and the two officials also say it meets several new product objectives the company has identified. Specifically, they say, it is part of a growing market, which they estimate at $100 million a year; it is perceived as more "wholesome" than sweet rolls and danish as a breakfast food; it broadens Sara Lee's participation in the frozen baked goods category, and it won't be easy for the competition to copy.

Sara Lee has marketed plain "croissants," in packages of six, as a frozen product since 1968. But that product will be restaged as "crescent" dinner rolls in conjunction with the croissant rollout.

The existing product has minor distribution nationally and "significant" distribution in New York and San Francisco.

Given no advertising support, the original croissant—more a bread-like dinner roll than a flaky pastry—still is "growing in spite of itself," at 10% to 15% increases in sales a year for the last three years, Mr. Sharoff said.

Sara Lee will break its croissants campaign this spring with network tv, couponed newspaper and Sunday insert advertising, followed up with magazine ads. The campaign, from Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, will position the product as an authentic, high-quality French croissant "consistent with the Sara Lee name and image," Mr. Sharoff said.

As for Pepperidge Farm, advertising for its new croissant is tagged: "Now you don't have to go all the way to France to get a great croissant." Ogilvy & Mather, New York, is handling the advertising, which includes tv.#—J.N.

The public's awareness of advertising of leading brands in a number of categories shifted significantly during November polling, as shown in this month-by-month listing of response percentages.

Tylenol awareness way up

vertising after the cyanide deaths. Anacin-3 supplanted Sterling Drug's Bayer aspirin in the No. 3 spot in the category; Bayer dropped 3.7 points to 3.3%.

In fast-food, another category that has witnessed large changes in awareness among the major competitors, Burger King recorded a 3.6 point drop in November. Burger King's hard-hitting comparative ads gave it a 15.7-point gain in awareness in October, the largest to date by any advertiser, but it stopped running most of those ads under pressure from competitors early last month.

Burger King nonetheless held onto much of its substantially increased awareness with a 20.5% score, compared to its average score of 7.3% in the six months preceding the controversial comparative campaign. Category leader McDonald's Corp. had a slight, statistically insignificant increase in awareness in November, to 36.5% from 35.6%. McDonald's November score was its second-lowest, after that for October.

Burger King's No. 2 position in top-of-mind awareness of all advertising, up from No. 3 in October, was its best ever and was better than McDonald's ranking for the second straight month. McDonald's fell from No. 5 to No. 6 in the overall ranking.

Several other advertisers managed to hold onto significant October gains last month. In wine & liquor, Gallo increased its score slightly to 6.2%, double its awareness level in September, before the company launched a new tv campaign with an "All the best" from Gallo theme. But awareness of No. 2 Riunite and of No. 3 Paul Masson also rose a bit last month—Riunite to 5.4% from 5% and Paul Masson to 3.8% from 2.3%.

In cameras, Polaroid, which had slumped badly from April to September, added to October's 3.3 point gain and regained the No. 2 spot in the category behind Kodak. Polaroid was named by 10.5% of the respondents in November, up from 8.7% in October. Polaroid has stepped up its James Garner-Mariette Hartley tv spots. Former No. 2 Canon suffered the month's largest decline: It fell 5.6 points to 7.7%, its lowest score to date.

The only two new category leaders were Avon in cosmetics & fragrances and Alpo in pet food. Avon was No. 3 in October and had a higher score than November's 3.8%. But October leader Estee Lauder dropped 2.8 points to 2.2%, and No. 5, Sophia, a new fragrance from the Coty division of Pfizer, was a newcomer to the top three, placing second with 3.1%.

Alpo was mentioned by 8.9% of the November respondents, up from 6.5% in October. Alpo, No. 2 in October, switched positions with October leader Purina, whose score fell to 6.4% from 7.1%.

The top 10 in top-of-mind awareness of all advertising—that not limited to a particular category—in November were Coca-Cola, No. 1; Burger King, No. 2; Tylenol, No. 3; Pepsi-Cola, No. 4; Miller beer, No. 5.; McDonald's, No. 6; Budweiser, No. 7; Ford, No. 8, and Tide and Bell Telephone, which tied for No. 9.#

Queries follow Lansing move

By MORRIE GELMAN

Los Angeles—Where Sherry Lansing is going and who will take her place as head of production at 20th Century-Fox Productions has become the No. 1 topic of conversation here.

Though Ms. Lansing's resignation last week should not have come as a surprise—the rumors about her leaving by choice or by demand had been rife for the last six months—its timing and the uncertainty about a successor and her future enlivened the holidays for a town that dotes on playing executive musical chairs.

What's apparent is that the 38-year-old Ms. Lansing, the first woman to have headed production for a major motion picture studio, quit, effective Dec. 20, with the promise to continue as president of Fox's movie division for as long as 30 days to help in the transition.

Alan Hirschfield, chairman and chief executive officer of the studio's parent company, 20th Century-Fox Film Corp., in accepting the resignation, made a special point of noting that Ms. Lansing's willingness to stay on suggests that "no successor has either been contemplated or designated."

Mr. Hirschfield was saying, in effect, that the resignation was a surprise to Fox and no replacement is in the wings.

Thom Mount, who heads Universal Pictures productions, has been mentioned as a possible successor to Ms. Lansing. Another scenario has Norman Levy, who heads Fox's movie distribution, as vice-chairman, playing a larger role in production. There are many in Hollywood who are convinced that there was a tug-of-war between production and distribution and Mr. Levy won.

Ms. Lansing is slated for a top industry job outside the Fox studio, but, because of supposed legal reasons, the new position wasn't disclosed immediately. Speculation is she may wind up partnered with Dan Melnick, an independent producer, who previously worked at Fox.

The best guess in the creative community here is that Ms. Lansing will join the newly formed joint movie production venture of CBS Inc., Home Box Office and Columbia Pictures. But at least one key insider claimed Ms. Lansing had not been offered any position with the new venture.#

Slater shop wins Bic account

By JOHN J. O'CONNOR

New York—While many agencies may be thankful just to have made it through a tough year, Slater, Hanft & Martin is closing out 1982 with $12 million in new business—including the $10 million Bic Pen Corp. account and Richardson-Vicks' $2 million Percogesic analgesic.

Slater, Hanft came up the winner in a review for the Bic shaver, butane lighter and writing instrument business, leaving Wells, Rich, Greene after an 11-year association. The agency also will be creating the ads for Bic's late entry next year in the erasable pen market (AA, Dec. 13).

Bic apparently has done a complete about-face on the future of erasable pens, now the industry's fastest-growing segment with 150 million units expected to be sold this year.

When Gillette's Paper Mate division created the category in 1979 with the introduction of Eraser-Mate, Bic advertising boss David Furman observed, "In our opinion, Eraser-Mate is just another of the superfluous products Gillette has brought to the writing instrument field. . .Would you want to sign a check or legal document with a pen whose ink can be erased?" (AA, Jan. 29, '79). Mr. Furman soon will have available a Bic erasable should such an occasion arise.

Mr. Furman couldn't have had as difficult a time during his "extensive search" for WRG's successor. In announcing the selection, he noted that Slater, Hanft principals Don Slater and Adam Hanft "were members of the team that did much of the work on the Bic lighter 'Flick your Bic' campaign" at WRG.

Along with the account, the Slater agency gains a new partner —Gary Roberts, formerly exec vp in charge of the Bic account at WRG. Symon & Hilliard remains the agency for Bic's commercial division and trade advertising.

Richardson-Vicks' assignment of Percogesic, formerly at Barnum Communications, is part of the company's plan to increase that brand's share in the over-the-counter analgesics market.#

Liquor entrepreneur finds his niche

"so why make it hard for consumers? There are many imported brands that fail here because their tastes have not been adjusted for the American market." But the art of appealing to the U.S. market doesn't end with a product that "drinks sweet." There is the matter of packaging. He is a strong believer in making the label and bottle design as appealing to the eye as the product is to tastebuds.

Next comes the advertising that, of itself, represents another chapter in the W.V. Elliott Co. story. Within the confines of his operation are the offices of William James Advertising, an agency Mr. Elliott and James Flaherty formed earlier this year. Mr. Flaherty is president; Mr. Elliott is exec vp, and Rita Bowlby, formerly an account supervisor at the Keiler Agency, Farmington, Conn., heads account management. Mr. Elliott's role with the agency does not extend beyond his own brands.

"I met Bill in 1976 after I became creative director of Tinker, Dodge & Delano," Mr. Flaherty said. "He was an opinionated, self-styled creative client and I was an opinionated, snotty creative director. It wasn't exactly love at first sight. But we found we respected each other's point of view, and out of that came a very good professional relationship on $12 million worth of Heublein business, including Smirnoff vodka and Arrow cordials. When he started his company, we became friends."

Flaherty & Co., a New York agency that Mr. Flaherty sold two years ago to TBWA Advertising, created the first ads for Rumple Minze and other products. Last July, Messrs. Flaherty and Elliott decided to form an agency on their own, although Mr. Flaherty continues to be a professional weekend innkeeper as proprietor of Troutbeck, an executive retreat and conference center in Dutchess County, N.Y.

The Elliott Co. account, involving a $700,000 budget for trade and consumer advertising, includes Rumple Minze, the flagship brand with estimated case sales of 45,000 this year; Schnapple, a 20,000-case brand that was introduced last May; Melano, going into six markets in February; Spritzen white wine, and two brands that were not created by Mr. Elliott—Monnet cognac and Antiquary scotch. In addition to liquor industry publications, Elliott brands are advertised in Cosmopolitan, Penthouse, Playboy and regional magazines.

Mr. Elliott's personal conviction about drinking in moderation is a hallmark of the company's advertising. Ads will advise simply, "Enjoy it in moderation" or weave a message into the copy platform.

Although Mr. Elliott has many other ideas for wines and specialty drinks waiting to be born, he said the time has come in his company's growth for him to seek "new, unique and proprietary" products in the "heavy-volume cash flow gin, scotch, bourbon and rum categories." He added, "We're dickering right now [with other companies] on those."

Mr. Elliott is mindful of the fact that "there isn't a distributor in America who needs a new product." To bridge that reality, he has brought in veteran salespeople (Eugene Palazzolo, August Sievers, Herbert Stouffer) with whom he worked at Heublein. "Part of our philosophy is that we can't depend on distributors to do it all for our brands," Mr. Elliott said. "We'll send in six, eight or nine people, into a given market to help make an impact. . .As we grow, none of our brands can succeed without a protagonist to believe in them, to make them work like Jack Martin did for Smirnoff vodka."# pany to handle the ESPN work.

ESPN said business news is one of several programing options it has been considering, with no changes planned for its prime time schedule of "live" sporting events. Experts in the cable field had speculated that the total-sports concept, while able to attract about 250 advertisers to ESPN thus far, would never make ESPN a profitable advertiser-supported vehicle.

One advertiser said "We all know that the male sports fan is not watching television, let alone ESPN, during the morning and afternoons."

Mr. Werner, however, said the network will achieve profitability exclusively with sports programing, and added that the network expects to be able to sell its daytime sports availabilities.#

$30 million ad drive begins

American Bell rings in its birth

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

NEW YORK—Among the New Year's Eve revelers at Times Square last Friday night were two weary men in tuxedos. Both had their eyes on the 3-by-40-ft. sign that the traditional falling Big Apple would eventually disappear behind as it signaled the arrival of 1983. For the event also was ringing in the arrival of a major new company on the American business scene.

The two men had worked for 45 days to prepare the sendoff for what is probably the largest corporate startup in the U.S. As the ball (apple) disappeared behind the sign and the words "AIS/American Bell" lit up, Robert T. Warstler, director of advertising at AIS/American Bell, and G. Kelly O'Dea, vp-management supervisor at Ogilvy & Mather, would know that, finally, the company informally known as Baby Bell was born.

"This was unlike any experience this agency has been through," Mr. O'Dea said just prior to the official birth. "We literally knew zero about what the company could do, but we had to understand it and put it in simple terms and concepts for others to understand. This isn't a new brand of peanut butter we are introducing."

After the arrival of 1983, and during the first 24 hours of both the new year and the O&M-created $30 million ad campaign, AIS/American Bell (AIS stands for Advanced Information Systems) executives estimated that the aver-

Tylenol launches 'comeback' ads

By PAT SLOAN

Johnson & Johnson, already well on its way to having pulled off the Comeback of the Year with its exceedingly strong Tylenol brand, was scheduled to air a carefully tested new commercial on network tv last night, the first regular advertising for the nonaspirin analgesic since disaster struck in Chicago last fall.

J&J executives call it the start of its 1983 "comeback" ad program, a Compton Advertising-produced effort designed to reintroduce Extra-Strength Tylenol capsules in their new tamper-proof packaging and reestablish the brand as the front-runner in the $1.2 billion analgesic category. The company declined to discuss its plans beyond this initial commercial flight, which will run on all three networks.

■ As earlier reported, Tylenol seems to be recapturing the market share it lost following the cyanide deaths in Chicago and the product's subsequent removal from store shelves. Two "early-warning" research services indicated that by November Tylenol tablets (all that was available at retail then) had surpassed their prepoisoning share of 22.2% in food stores in four controlled markets and, in a broader nationwide sampling, had regained almost half of the

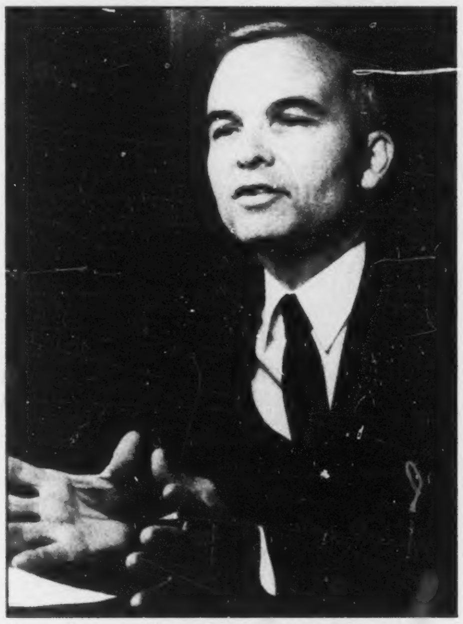
Campbell's McGovern top Adman

By GAY JERVEY
and NANCY GIGES



For dramatic change at Campbell Soup Co., Gordon McGovern is AA's pick as 1982 Adman of the Year.

It may have been a first. On the morning of last April 22, the board of directors of Campbell Soup Co.—pinstripes and all—went grocery shopping in a ShopRite store in Caldwell, N.J.

Leading the procession was R. Gordon McGovern, Campbell Soup's president-chief executive officer. He felt a lot more at home in the supermarket than his colleagues, some of whom admitted they hadn't been in a supermarket for years: Mr. McGovern does his family shopping every Saturday.

"Now, it's not particularly interesting to most people," Mr. McGovern, a graying 56, says. "But I really get into how and what people eat. I find it fascinating."

Happily for Campbell Soup Co., Mr. McGovern's fascination with what America eats and why has helped transform it from a stodgy, production-oriented canning operation into one of the most aggressive market-driven companies in the food industry today. For doing so, Mr. McGovern has been named ADVERTISING AGE's Adman of the Year for 1982.

In his present position for barely two years, the former head of Campbell's Pepperidge Farm subsidiary has:

- Increased Campbell's marketing expenditures 72% and nearly doubled its advertising budget.
- Replaced the company's longtime ad agency for its flagship red-label, condensed soups, leading to a new ad campaign that helped reverse eight years of flat or lower sales.
- Adopted an ambitious new-product program calling for two major new items a year, and built several recent introductions into some of the hottest products in the food industry.
- Announced his intention to acquire companies that will add at least $200 million to Campbell's sales every two years, a program already begun.
- Orchestrated the acquisition of key assets of Mrs. Paul's Kitchens, making Campbell the country's largest frozen fish marketer.

For his part, Mr. McGovern says modestly that he is mostly executing the plans of his predecessors. But many Campbell observers disagree, insisting that while previous regimes talked about change, little was actually done.

The company, whose stock is publicly traded, is 60% controlled by Philadelphia's Dorrance family, and for nearly all of its 114 years it has been run like a family concern. It not only ignored new products, but insisted on keeping a lid on the prices of its old products, thus squeezing profitability.

"With [its] commanding share of the soup market, Campbell simply should have been less afraid of price competition from private brands, should not have been so hesistant about raising prices," says Leonard Teitelbaum, a securities analyst for Merrill Lynch. "It appeared that Campbell felt it was its patriotic duty to feed America for 10¢ a can."

Campbell's profits grew by only 8% to 9% annually over the past decade, far less than those of a number of other major food companies. But in the fiscal year ended last August, profits rose 15% to $149.6 million and sales 5.3% to $2.94 billion. Mr. McGovern says his objective is a 15% gain in both

'Silent' Schick enters disposable razor fray

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

Warner-Lambert Co.'s Schick razor unit will begin shipping a new disposable razor to retailers this week. The introductory ad campaign, at a rate of $12 million annually, breaks in March.

The advertising expenditure represents a sharp departure from past outlays for the usually subdued Schick. Although the budget would seem to move the company closer to ad spending parity in the disposable category with Gillette Co. and Bic Pen, Gillette is expected to beef up ad spending for its disposable razors in 1983.

According to Leading National Advertisers, Bic spent $7.7 million and Gillette $5 million to advertise disposable razors in 1981. For the first six months of 1982, Gillette spent $4.7 million on disposables while Bic spent a little over $3 million, according to LNA.

In the total razor category, Gillette dominated Schick in 1981 with $13.3 million in ad spending compared to Schick's $6.3 million.

The news of Schick's entry into the disposable market was taken calmly by the competition. "This is no surprise to us," said Richard O'Hearn, Gillette marketing services manager. "We've expected this for some time."

Schick began taking orders for its Schick disposable in November. Packaged in five-packs, the razors come to about 24¢ each for retailers. Warner-Lambert said the retail price to consumers would be below Gillette's Good News disposable, but higher than Bic's.

Warner-Lambert said the Schick entry has some unique features. The handle is said to have a unique design while the business end of the razor has a permanent "safety cap" to insure sharpness.

Industry sources said Schick was forced into the disposable market because it is the growing segment of the razor business. Gillette has over 60% of the estimated $500 million-to-$600 million razor market while Bic has a 10% share. Disposable razors account for less than 25% of the market.

Schick's new advertising, via William Esty Co., is not yet complete. W-L said it will be at least two weeks before copy is in place.

The first print offering will contain a coupon for a free five-pack. Schick will follow with distribution of 58 million 25¢-off coupons beginning March 14.#

CBS sets new news show

By DIANE MERMIGAS

CBS News president Van Gordon Sauter is expected to announce plans this week for a new weekly summer prime time news show to be anchored by either Bill Moyers, Charles Kuralt or Bill Kurtis.

The series could possibly feature contributions from all three newsmen as well as others, and most likely will be an interview showcase different from CBS' "60 Minutes," ABC's "20/20" or NBC's proposed news magazine set to premiere March 19.

If the new show performs well in the summer ratings, it could be picked up for the 1983-84 fall season.

The CBS 1983 news budget, although the only network news budget calling for staff cuts (AA, Dec. 13), provides production funds for a second hour of weekly prime time news. All three networks traditionally have programed only one hour of weekly prime time news, usually in the form of a news magazine. Although the networks recently introduced news in late-night and early-morning time periods, none of the networks plans extensive news expansion this year.

■ Two of the three newsmen confirmed they have discussed their possible participation in a new news series with Mr. Sauter, but declined to elaborate on the details. "I just don't know what form the show will take, but I do know that it will happen. Van has promised to make a decision within the week," one of the newsmen said. However, should Mr. Moyers be involved, the series would not be patterned after his former, highly acclaimed public tv series.

Mr. Sauter, who was vacationing last week and unavailable for comment, has said he wants to keep CBS' news commitment strong despite financial concerns. Ratings for both the "CBS Evening News" and "CBS Morning News" have accelerated during the past several months.

On a more immediate front, CBS is seeking to strengthen its series ranks in February and March, when it faces strong ABC miniseries competition.

The network, this tv season's runaway ratings leader in prime time, has lured John Schneider and Tom Wopat back to their leading roles in "The Dukes of Hazzard," which has plummeted from the seventh-highest rated show last season to 33rd in the national

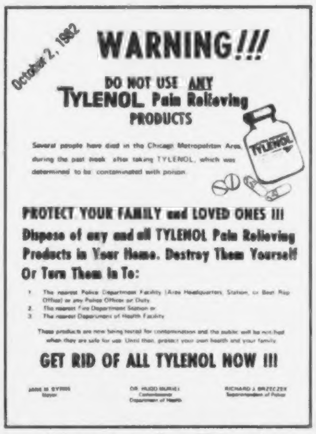
J&J's Tylenol tops list of products that made news in 1982

A number of consumer products made news in 1982, not only in the business community but among the general public as well. They were led by the analgesic Tylenol, which became the center of attention in a tragic occurrence late in the year. Following are the top 10 product newsmakers as selected by the editors of ADVERTISING AGE:

One of the marketing success stories of the 1970s, Johnson & Johnson's Tylenol pain reliever faced its greatest challenge in 1982. Seven Chicago-area people died after taking Tylenol capsules that had been contaminated intentionally with cyanide, apparently the work of a random killer.

Although the company and its manufacturing procedures quickly were cleared of any possible direct role in the disaster, there was some question initially as to the brand's ability to survive. But J&J soon made it clear it was committed to doing whatever was necessary to reinstate Tylenol to its prepoisoning status as the nation's leading analgesic.



October 2, 1982

WARNING!!!

TYLENOL Pain Relieving PRODUCTS

Several people have died in the Chicago Metropolitan Area during the past week after taking TYLENOL, which was determined to be contaminated with poison.

PROTECT YOUR FAMILY and LOVED ONES !!!

Dispose of any and all TYLENOL Pain Relieving Products in Your Home. Destroy Them Yourself Or Turn Them In To:

GET RID OF ALL TYLENOL NOW !!!

Disaster strikes Tylenol.

J&J's McNeil Consumer Products Co. immediately stopped advertising and recalled the lots from which the contaminated bottles had come. Within days, as it became apparent that the contamination occurred at the retail level, J&J withdrew all Tylenol regular and extra-strength capsules from the national market. When its research indicated that consumers wanted to hear directly from J&J about what it was doing, the company ran a tv spot featuring McNeil medical director Thomas Gates. He noted the company's concern about product tamperings and expressed its commitment to reintroduce and support Tylenol.

About a month after the incident, J&J resumed regular advertising for other products in the Tylenol line. The capsules since have been repackaged with a triple safety-seal and are reappearing on retail shelves. Ads for the analgesic, initially focusing on the new packaging, are now resuming. Even before that return of Tylenol capsules, however, market shares for tablets appeared to be rebounding despite heavy competition that emerged from brands never before advertised to the consumer.

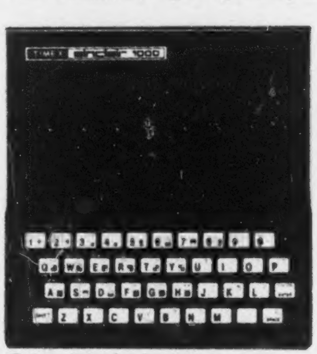
In the aftermath of the Tylenol tampering, a rash of contaminations of a variety of consumables around the country took place, and the government responded with record speed in issuing new tamper-resistant packaging regulations.

Caffeine purge.

In retrospect, 1982 will be viewed as the year the minuscule no-caffeine soft drink segment exploded into a viable one. Stirring up this change was Seven-Up Co., which not only introduced Like, its first cola, as a 99% caffeine-free product, but launched an ad campaign for flagship 7UP that stressed its no-caffeine qualities. It created a rush of industry controversy.

Seven-Up actually broke the no-caffeine issue with the high-powered marketing campaign for the ailing 7UP, before the long-awaited debut of Like in April. The new campaign replaced a sports-oriented push and announced that the lemon-lime soft drink was "crisp and clean. No caffeine. Never had it. Never will." These claims infuriated Pepsi-Cola Co., which believed Seven-Up was raising an unjustifiable health question about an ingredient inherent in all colas.

In retaliation, Pepsi reportedly threatened to rescind agreements with Pepsi/7UP bottlers if they supported the campaign. The Federal Trade Commission got into the picture, looking into that combative behavior. Soon after, PepsiCo unleashed Pepsi Free, a 99% caffeine-free cola, and a sugar-free counterpart. Seven-Up responded to that by a complaint to the National Advertising Division charging that Pepsi Free advertising was misleading consumers on the caffeine issue, a charge the NAD quickly rejected.



Price right for home computers.

Royal Crown Cola Co. introduced a decaffeinated RC Cola during the year. In fact, RC was the no-caffeine pioneer by virtue of its 1980 introduction of RC 100, a caffeine-free and sugar-free product. Coca-Cola Co. premiered Diet Coke, which does have caffeine, but it apparently is being groomed as the soft drink giant's main sugar-free drink, which could lead to a reformulation of Tab into being caffeine-free. Dr Pepper jumped in with Pepper Free, a caffeine and sugar-free drink.

Some analysts predict that by 1986, caffeine-free drinks will take up 15% of the total market; others see a crest of 5% by the same time.

The price of technology came together with marketing strategy to push the home computer into the grasp of the average consumer last year.

During the summer, Texas Instruments announced it would offer a $100 rebate on its TI 99-4A. Commodore International followed by dropping prices on its Vic-20 home computer by $25 to $40 at the wholesale

Ad rate growth to hover around 10%

Forecast & Review

The outlook for advertising growth in 1983 indicates increases of about 10% over 1982, and anticipated rate increases are, for the most part, in the same area.

McCann-Erickson vp Robert Coen, who regularly forecasts ad volume, has indicated he expects an ad dollar volume gain of 9.2% for '83. He also sees national media ad volume rising an average 11.7%.

By major media, here's the outlook for ad rate increases this year:

Television: Various industry sources are anticipating tv network rate increases to be in the 12%-to-14% range over-all. That also was the range estimated earlier by Mr. Coen (AA, Dec. 13). Spot tv rates may average out about the same, showing increases in the low teens for the first half and tailing off to single-digit figures in the second half of the year, according to Mr. Coen.

Cable: Because there are now nearly 20 ad-supported cable networks, each still in its infancy and growing at different paces, rate increases are expected to be significant as well as diverse, ranging anywhere from 20% to over 100%. Even in 1982, cable rates, while generally considered low in comparison to other media, have differed tremendously, from as low as $30 per spot for some of the newest and smallest contenders to $6,600 on WTBS. Three factors will determine how much each network's rates increase, said Jeff Lawenda, vp-advertising sales, USA Network: Supply and demand, subscriber growth and programing costs.

Newspapers: Newspapers rate increases in 1983 will probably average about 9%, according to a survey of the nation's major papers recently conducted by Edward Parmalee, vp-marketing, Knight-Ridder Newspapers. Those increases contrast with the 11% rate hikes that were the average in '82.

Media rates '83 outlook

Television	12% to 14%
Cable	20% to 100%
Newspapers	9%
Magazines	8% to 9%
Radio	5% to 8%

Magazines: Magazine advertising rates could rise from 8% to 9% during 1983, according to Marvin M. Gropp, vp-research, Magazine Publishers Assn. That would be about the same as the average increase during 1982.

Radio: Radio prices in both spot and network in 1983 are expected to increase 5% during the first six months and as much as 8% during the second half of the year if the economy rebounds. The rate increase is comparable to radio price hikes in 1982, a year in which stations and networks started off the year projecting 8%-to-10% price hikes, then scaled those increases downward as the year went on and the economy continued to sour, industry sources noted.

Direct marketing: According to the Direct Marketing Assn., direct marketers are not expecting any dramatic increases in the year to come, largely because the Postal Service says it won't raise its rates until 1984. The DMA is predicting, however, a 10% increase in direct marketing expenditures and a 12% increase in direct mail.#

dubbed "Luisigate," the giant ad agency had to restate its earnings for the past four years, writing off $30 million in pretax earnings, including a $12.4 million charge against the 1981 earnings.

In the wake of the syndication unit scandal, JWT first stopped the practice of time banking (exchanging syndicated programs for time to be used later by its clients) and then got out of the business by shuttering the syndication division. Spot tv buying was shifted to the media department, and the director of spot buying now reports to the business manager and media director.

But JWT's troubles were not over. One of the company's stockholders, Robert Gray, formerly with Hill & Knowlton (a JWT subsidiary), sued the agency for $10 million. And the Securities & Exchange Commission and the Justice Department reportedly are continuing their investigation of the agency.

John DeLorean

John Z. DeLorean was arrested last October on charges of conspiring to possess and distribute cocaine. That was a long fall for the man who once had been the rising star at General Motors—general manager of its Pontiac division and then Chevrolet. In between making it to the 14th floor at the GM building and landing in jail in Los Angeles, he narrated the revealing book, "On a Clear Day You Can See General Motors," developed the stainless-steel DeLorean automobile, started the DeLorean Motor Co. with help from Margaret Thatcher's government in the U.K. and saw his company begin the slide into bankruptcy.

Mr. DeLorean had promised his company would build a car for the consumer, but the final product turned out to be a sports car with a suggested price of $25,000. Dealers at first had no trouble selling the new car, sometimes charging more than the suggested price. But the DeLorean got the reputation of being underpowered and of having poor visibility to the rear. Sales and prices dropped sharply. The 1982 ad budget for the DeLorean was expected to be around $12 million, later said to be $5 million and finally turned out to be just over $1 million. Mr. Delorean had trouble with the British government, his factory in Northern Ireland, his ad agency and his bankers.

But as his company prepared for bankruptcy, Mr. DeLorean allegedly planned a major cocaine deal to raise money to save it.

In November, Mr. DeLorean pleaded innocent to the charges and his trial is scheduled to begin April 19.#

Compton chief executive officer O. Milton Gossett (r.) and exec vp Philip Voss Jr. open the agency's new teleconference room as execs from client Procter & Gamble in Cincinnati watch the inaugural festivities via the two-way technology.

Goodby, LaGuardia, hello teleconference

New York—Tapping the latest in technology, Compton Advertising is staying in closer contact with a major client, Procter & Gamble, through their joint use of teleconferencing.

The agency and P&G have installed teleconference facilities that permit two-way audio/video communication for P&G business, and Compton chief executive officer Milt Gossett says the agency hopes to sell the concept to other clients. A presentation has been scheduled for Johnson & Johnson.

The new setup is a "very, very valuable and cost-saving tool," Mr. Gossett said. The agency uses the teleconference room for the second presentation of a campaign and for copy meetings. With the setup, it can show storyboard and print ads to P&G executives in Cincinnati and agreement on changes or whatever can be made on the spot, the need for plane trips by agency or client eliminated.

The new teleconference room also is equipped with a two-way mirror and audio/video taping equipment, to be used for focus group/consumer panel interviews.#

Sterling guns aim at leader Tylenol

New York—Johnson & Johnson's comeback campaign for aspirin-free Tylenol is about to encounter new pain-killer products from Sterling Drug that will throw the chaotic analgesic market into a furious round of heavy new advertising and promotion.

After years of deliberation, and one false start, Sterling's Glenbrook Laboratories has chosen early April to introduce to the U.S. market aspirin-free Panadol, its leading pain reliever in Great Britain and a major seller in more than 70 other countries for more than 25 years.

But in the immediate future, Glenbrook has begun its introduction of a new entry, Maximum Bayer aspirin, and is relaunching Bayer timed-release aspirin as a companion to its regular Bayer aspirin.

SSC&B is the agency for all of these entries in the $1.2 billion analgesic market.

Glenbrook and Sterling execs would not discuss ad budgets or promotional plans, and there are indications the plans are not complete. The release to the press late last week of its intention to launch the product may have been designed to get the word out, to blunt J&J's new push for Tylenol. Regardless, industry sources are certain these moves signal the start of a costly escalation of advertising among Glenbrook and J&J, plus American Home Products with Anacin-3 and Bristol-Myers with Datril nonaspirin.

What makes the Sterling decision all the Continental fires 2 execs

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

Continental Airlines has fired two top executives it recently brought in to infuse new life into its marketing operation.

Bruce Hicks, a spokesman for Los Angeles-based Continental, said James V. O'Donnell, who had served in various high-level marketing posts for parent Texas Air during a 10-year career, and Ron Woestemeyer, who had been with the company for 13 years in marketing and sales posts, left Continental under a "mutual understanding" with the company.

However, industry sources, including former employes of Texas International and New York Air, a Texas Air subsidiary, said both men were fired the week before Christmas by Robert D. Gallaway, exec vp-office of the president at Continental. Mr. Gallaway was himself recruited by Mr. O'Donnell after Texas Air Corp. acquired Continental in 1981.

■ Mr. Hicks said no official announcement of the departures had been made and that none would be forthcoming until the marketing area is reorganized. Sources said David Stamey, a Texas International marketing executive who recently came over to Continental, would be named to head the Women's books drop combined pitch

7 Sisters act breaks up

By STUART J. ELLIOTT

New York—All sister acts, it seems, eventually break up—the Andrews Sisters, the McGuire Sisters, even the Seven Sisters.

The seven major women's service magazines last winter and spring sponsored an unusual joint presentation to top advertisers and agencies (AA, Jan. 25), selling their field rather than themselves.

The message of their presentation, called "How to Put Seven Bees in Your Budget," was this: Alive and well, the Seven Sisters—Better Homes and Gardens, Family Circle, Good Housekeeping, Ladies' Home Journal, McCall's, Redbook and Woman's Day—merit a second look as an adjunct to any tv buy.

In retrospect, executives of most of the magazines consider the sister act to have been a hit. "There's no doubt in my mind business has come in as a result of it," said J. Wesley Silk, Better Homes and Gardens publisher. It was "a very, very solid statement," said Robert Mate, advertising sales director of Woman's Day, "that countered the negative publicity about the women's service field 'going out of business.' "

And most are willing to think about a comeback tour. "A large part of the ad community would take notice, and that would be positive," said Ladies' Home Journal ad director Gregory W. Dunn.

But there are five reasons it appears unlikely there'll be a reunion of this sister act.

First was the decision by one-seventh of the sisters to withdraw from the slide, talk and print presentation before it ended.

Good Housekeeping left because "we had our own song to sing," said Raymond Petersen, its publishing director and exec vp-Hearst Magazines. "We don't like to be in the swim with everybody else. We don't even like the term 'Seven Sisters.'

"Quite frankly, we feel Good Housekeeping is different and not really part of that group," he Promotional piece touted the power of combination.

Richardson-Vicks' late '82 rollout of Tempo (left) spurred new-product action from Norcliff-Thayer, whose Tums is No. 2 in the chewable antacid market. The Revlon unit is introducing Tums E-X nationally, using the commercial above, and test marketing Sweet Relief.

Tums adds strength to fight new antacids

By NANCY GIGES

For years, the chewable antacid market consisted of a two-horse race between heavy ad spender Rolaids and satisfied runner-up Tums.

Now, with the national introductions of products from two other major companies, Tempo from Richardson-Vicks and Lo-Sal from Sterling Drug, the two established brands are gearing up for a major battle in the $100 million category.

Rolaids, marketed by Warner-Lambert, traditionally received almost twice as much ad backing as rival Tums. That old brand was marketed by the small, family-owned Lewis Howe Co. of St. Louis until it was acquired by Revlon in 1978. Now marketed by Revlon's Norcliff-Thayer division, Tarrytown, N.Y., Tums is receiving the benefit of Revlon's marketing expertise and is hoping to expand its 21% market share to 25% with the introduction of Tums E-X extra strength antacid.

For the present, Norcliff has suspended advertising for regular Tums to devote its entire budget, estimated at $9 million annually, to the new item's debut. Rolaids holds an estimated 32% share and is backed by about $12 million in measured media annually.

Exactly why Vicks and Sterling decided to enter the chewable antacid market at this time is not clear. The market has been static for some time.

It's somewhat surprising that the market has remained stable, since per capita consumption has remained level while the heaviest-user segment—older consumers—has been growing, commented Pat McGrath, president of Jordan, Case & McGrath, the Tums agency. He speculated that perhaps people simply are taking better care of themselves, a practice that could help prevent stomach problems.

Mr. McGrath expressed the hope that the increased activity will stimulate category growth so that the dogfight won't be quite so vicious. Tempo is expected to receive about $7 million in ad spending for its current launch and Lo-Sal about $5 million. Vicks reportedly held up

Atari, computers electronics stars

By MORRIE GELMAN

LAS VEGAS—From Atari videogames for preschool children to American Audio's compact in-dash car video unit to American Bell consumer products to the hottest items, under-$100 home computers, new products were most prominent at last week's Consumer Electronics Show here.

Atari's new videogame venture, Kid's Library, will get an advertising sendoff starting in May with a print campaign, followed by a September "media blitz"—heavy in use of tv—tied in with a back-to-school pitch.

The Atari Kid's Library, a collection of educational videogames for children under the age of 12 (AA, Jan. 3), is being handled in cooperation with the Children's Computer Workshop, a for-profit spinoff of the nonprofit Children's Television Workshop, producer of "Sesame Street" and "Electric Company" for tv.

Atari consumer electronics division president Michael Moone, who ducked talking about specific budget figures—"because we're still working them out"—indicated that marketing expenditure for Kid's Library would be "significant." The ad approach, he said, would be institutional and directed at parents. Wells, Rich, Greene is handling.

Atari will release five Children's Computer Workshop game cartridges for its VCS 2600 system. These games are designed for 3-to-7-year-old children. Later this year, Atari will release several CCW games for the 5200 system. Available in May for the 2600 will be Cookie Monster Munch and Grover's Music Maker. Available in July will be Oscar's Trash Race, Big Bird's Egg Catch and Alpha Beam.

Later this fall, the Atari Kid's Library will offer games especially designed for preteens featuring Peanuts characters. Atari also has worked out a deal with Walt Disney Productions to develop game cartridges for both the 2600 and 5200 systems, for preteen children. These games will feature Disney characters such as Mickey Mouse, Donald Duck and Snow White.

The government defrocking of Ma Bell opened up last week's introduction of a host of telephone and telephone accessory products, the most notable being the first new offerings from American Bell, the AT&T subsidiary that started business Jan. 1.

The products American Bell introduced were the Genesis Telesystem, a modular telecommunications system, and the Touch-a-Matic 1600, the first in a new generation of automatic dialing telephones. The latter will be in some stores in March and available nationwide by May. Genesis will be initially available slightly later, about the middle of the year.

Both, made by Western Electric, AT&T's manufacturing subsidiary, will be sold by the 461 Bell PhoneCenters, as well as by 851 Sears stores and 2,700 catalog outlets and 200 Target discount stores in 20 states, among other retailers.

The two American Bell products will be promoted via a major advertising push keyed to the current Bell theme: "It's Ingenious—It's Genuine Bell." Its objective

Atari's problems laid to retailers

Responding to questions at an impromptu press conference, Atari consumer electronics division president Michael Moone blamed the videogame leader's fourth-quarter sales problems on the retail business. "Many people used Atari as a loss leader," he claimed.

Maintaining that it's premature at this point to discuss post-Christmas market shares for the videogame market, Mr. Moone preferred to focus on the problems of retailers, noting that "a number of major people had to go Chapter 11." He cited King's stores in New England and Zody's in California.

"It's difficult when you close stores to have sensational Christmas sales," he Ads set to break

Big Mac's NFL attack

By RICHARD KREISMAN

Tv viewers will get their first glimpse of McDonald's new advertising campaign this coming weekend, and what they will see and hear is a double dose: Hard-sell product advertising and soft-sell corporate advertising that draws on the company's position as the longtime leader in the chain restaurant business.

What most of them won't know is that the advertising represents the fusion of McDonald's and Leo Burnett USA's marketing and creative resources.

While Burnett has been actively producing and airing McDonald's spots since it surprised the advertising world in October, 1981, by winning the $75 million account, its efforts were tied to the resurrected "You deserve a break today" theme of former agency NH&S/USA.

The new work is Burnett's, and both the company—which has been the target of No. 2 Burger King's aggressive comparative advertising—and the agency, with its creative reputation under heavy scrutiny, are on the line.

The first spot is scheduled to break on Saturday's NFL football

New rule may fuel gas station games

WASHINGTON—Rule changes by the Federal Trade Commission making it easier to promote traffic-building games come at a time when gasoline retailers, once major game users, are showing "renewed interest" in the promotional potential of games.

"It hasn't broken open yet," said promotional games specialist Louis Gerber, exec vp of Glendinning Cos. of Westport (Conn.) of oil company interest in games. "But a lot of people are taking a hard look at the potential."

The FTC action lifts disclosure requirements that were put on the books in 1969 after abuses were uncovered in the conduct of some games. The rules apply to supermarkets and gasoline retailers only, and require that print and broadcast ads promoting games not only disclose the exact number of prizes available and the odds of winning them, but update the prize lists and odds computations as prizes are awarded during the course of the game.

Mr. Gerber said the requirements effectively made radio impossible to use, although they were "manageable" in tv if the retailer wanted only a brief introductory ad campaign. But once a game is more than four weeks old, Mr. Gerber said the rule required weekly changes in commercials to reflect the changed prize and odds lineup. "The costs become just awful," he said.

The prize and odds disclosures still are required for print ads promoting supermarket and gas station games.

Telecom Productions president Richard Palmer called the FTC action on broadcast ad disclosures "a godsend to those of us in this business" and said he expected to have new commercials on the air by Feb. 1 for some of his clients.

John H. Haines, manager-oil products advertising and sales promotion, Shell Oil Co., said the modification will make it easier for oil companies to get their game messages across in "uncluttered" commercials, but he doubted that it will spark a rush to put promotional games on the market.

Shell recently tested a game (AA, Nov. 15), but none of the other major oil companies have followed its lead.

Ann C. Iverson, senior vp-director of account services, Ogilvy & Mather, Houston, Shell's agency, said that during a 13-week run of 30-second spots for Shell's "Match & Win" game test, the spots in one market alone had to be changed nine times at a total cost of $13,300. One 30-second commercial, she said, cost $740 to change.

Norman Vincoff, manager-marketing services, Sun Co., said Sun had no plans to field a game promotion but added, "Our interest would be fueled if we saw our competitors beginning to move."

A spokesman for Mobil Oil said Mobil had no plans to offer games, but was continuing to study its competition. An Exxon spokesman would not speculate on the reaction to the commission's decision and said Exxon was not planning to use any game promotions. A spokesman for Amoco Oil also said it had no plans for promotional games.

■ L.J. Boyle, advertising manager at Tulsa-based Getty Refining & Marketing Co., said manufacturers of games have begun soliciting him. "We don't have any specific plans to go into games," Mr. Boyle said, "but the rumors are out there concerning a few companies that have games in the developmental stages.

"Games historically have given a quick shot in the arm but don't hold volume," Mr. Boyle said.#

Seaman, Foley cited

WASHINGTON—Two leaders from the agency world, Paul Foley of the Interpublic Group of Cos., and Alfred J. Seaman of Interpublic agency SSC&B, were elected last week to the American Advertising Federation Hall of Fame.

Mr. Foley, 68, climbed to the presidency of Interpublic from McCann-Erickson in 1971, and served as chairman-chief executive officer from 1973 to 1979. Mr. Seaman, 70, for 20 years vice-chairman of SSC&B became chairman in 1979 when the agency was acquired by Interpublic. He retired in 1981.

"Both Mr. Foley and Mr. Seaman built great agencies founded on the highest professional and ethical standards," the hall of fame council of judges said in a statement. "Both were heavily involved in causes serving the advertising industry and the public at large. Their careers reflect honor on all of us associated with advertising."

Under Mr. Foley's direction, Interpublic grew with the acquisition of Campbell-Ewald. He is credited with helping initiate service warranties for the auto industry, was one of the first in the agency business to initiate agency checks on product claims and was the first

How to build impulse sales with high-impact in-store signs and displays

Today, many of the nation's largest advertisers rely on signs and displays to maximize the impact of their overall marketing programs. Point-of-purchase signs and displays create an exciting selling environment that grabs the attention of consumers and sparks impulse sales.

The 8th POPAI/DuPont Study of Consumer Buying Habits in Supermarkets—which monitored 53,000 purchases made by 4,000 shoppers at 200 supermarkets—indicates that consumers make almost two-thirds of their buying decisions (64.8 percent) in the store. The study found that shoppers are influenced strongly by P-O-P displays, along with the product's price, packaging, newness and other in-store factors. The research also showed that consumers continue to spend $1.40 for each minute they remain in the store after an initial average 24.9-minute shopping trip. And targeted P-O-P materials play an integral role in keeping shoppers in the store.

As a result, retailers are coming to depend on P-O-P to influence and entice consumers, dress up the store and put the fun back into the shopping experience.

Point-of-purchase, however, does more than entertain customers. Its big advantage is that it attracts consumers when they are shopping, when the three ingredients necessary for the sale—consumer, product and money—are all present. And regardless of the reasons why customers may have originally entered the store, P-O-P can heavily influence their selected brand decisions; it can stimulate additional impulse purchases in the same department, as well as elsewhere in the store.

Independent studies by marketers and trade publications show that in some retail outlets, 80 percent of consumers always or sometimes make an impulse purchase. Other consumer shopping patterns were analyzed in the recent POPAI/DuPont Pilot Study of Consumer Buying Habits in Drug Stores. The study showed, for example, that more than one-third of all drugstore purchases are unplanned, and that coupons appearing in store circulars and store newspapers are used more by consumers than manufacturers' coupons appearing in daily newspapers.

The Pilot Drug Store Study was the result of 781 face-to-face interviews with consumers in 12 high-volume retail outlets in four American cities. Consumers were randomly approached inside the drugstore entrance; later their purchases were scrutinized in a second surprise interview at checkout. Demographic information about the buyers and a record of all items purchased were kept. Purchases were categorized as follows:

- Specifically planned—consumers had a specific brand or item in mind when they entered the store and purchased that brand or item as planned;
- Generally planned—shoppers had a category of product but not a particular brand in mind when they entered the store;
- Substitute planned—shoppers changed from a "specifically planned" purchase to another item;
- Unplanned—shoppers purchased an item which they did not originally have in mind.

All of the responses to the last three categories were combined to determine the number of in-store purchasing decisions made. The study monitored in-store buying decisions for various product categories: in soft goods and personal accessories, for example, 87 percent of the decisions to buy were made in-store; for snack foods, the figure was 77.8 percent. This was followed by cosmetics, 69.2 percent; non-alcoholic beverages, 66.7 percent; personal care products, 64.7 percent; magazines, books, newspapers and stationery, 58.4 percent; drugs and medicine, 48.9 percent; tobacco products, 33.3 percent; and alcoholic beverages, 20 percent. (See chart on page fourteen.)

The Pilot Study is just the beginning of consumer research in drugstores. In response to industry interest in consumer buying patterns, POPAI and DuPont are planning a full-scale national study of more than 13,000 consumers in 250 drugstores and outlets selling health and beauty aids, prescriptions and general merchandise. In addition to providing an

P-O-P merchandisers cut through ad clutter

Jules Rose, Chairman of the Board, Sloan's Supermarkets: "My main concern, as a merchandiser, is to build sales. Point-of-purchase is the culmination of a promotional program. Without it, retailers would lose one of their strongest selling tools—an opportunity to grab the customer's attention in the store. We know that the use of P-O-P displays is responsible for increasing sales by up to 400 percent.

"One of the big problems that marketers and retailers have is the visual clutter that takes place in the stores. Customers are confronted by countless products. Good P-O-P sets specific brands and product categories apart from the crowd; it helps clear up the clutter. P-O-P is especially effective when tied in to marketers' print and TV advertising campaigns. It helps reinforce awareness of a product.

"The use of P-O-P is determined by market segmentation. In certain product categories, programs have to be tailored to appeal to targeted consumer groups. For the HBA category, for example, trial-size offers work well in such areas as Manhattan's Upper East Side where there are a lot of young single customers; they don't work well in areas where there's a heavy concentration of families. P-O-P displays that tie in with a sports personality have strong appeal in ethnic areas." ☐ accurate picture of the decisions that the shopper makes, the POPAI/DuPont study will:

- Reflect regional and national buying patterns of thousands of products and provide brand information;
- Provide demographics and characteristics of consumers;
- Determine incidence of purchase of all regularly purchased products;
- Record consumer shopping trips by frequency, number and types of stores visited, and total amount of purchases;
- Reflect the interacting of product purchasing patterns;
- Project cross-merchandising opportunities;
- Tabulate such store characteristics as volume, size and location, and explain their relationship to purchasing patterns and demographics. ☐

Retailer uses displays to attract shoppers

John Stabenau, Vice President/General Merchandise Manager, Marshall Field & Co.: "P-O-P is absolutely necessary to attract the impulse buyer. It creates the proper ambiance in which to display products. As a rule, we try to tie in our P-O-P displays to marketers' advertising. The dual effort has a very positive impact on sales.

"The use of P-O-P to make the in-store area more attractive to customers increases volume and puts an element of 'fun' back into shopping. The proper use of P-O-P materials piques customers' interest and keeps them shopping longer.

"We use P-O-P to help set such product categories as fragrance and soap apart from the rest of the beauty department. Special displays draw consumers' attention—and dollars." ☐

P-O-P spending

two categories: those with a merchandising emphasis on price, and those offering specialized services and convenience. In both instances, P-O-P materials have become an effective, even necessary, way to encourage consumer spending, by drawing attention to either a "special value offer" or to an attractively displayed product section, i.e., gourmet foods or natural-ingredient hair care products.

Permanent vs. temporary P-O-P

Permanent, as compared to temporary, P-O-P advertising is just what it says—when it's up, it stays up. More specifically, permanent (long-term) displays and signs are designed to be restocked and to have a lifespan that ranges from six months to several years. They are generally made of wood, wire, metal or more expensive plastics. Temporary (short-term) signs and displays are those units that are eliminated after their stock has been depleted through sale, and/or units designed for use for six months or less.

Each type of P-O-P fulfills a specific merchandising function. Signs keep a company's name and trademark constantly before consumers' eyes and give them a distinct and lasting impression of a company or a product. They bring all of a company's marketing efforts into focus directly at the point-of-purchase.

Displays encourage consumers to buy the merchandise that is shown. They help retailers and marketers to make sales after the consumers have been pre-conditioned by advertising and other types of promotion. The successful display embodies the four I's of P-O-P:

- Impact that immediately grabs the consumer's attention and creates interest in the product line;
- Identification that dramatically links the display's message to the source;
- Information that delivers relevant, meaningful product information to the consumer;
- Imagery that communicates the sales message to the consumer and establishes the perceived relevance of the product.

Temporary and permanant displays play an important part in product and service merchandising. Temporary counter units, highly effective as displays for merchandise that customers buy on impulse, are easily placed on the counter, ready to sell with little inconvenience to the retailer. Quickly installed, these displays are characterized by vibrant colors and strong sales inducements. They stand out in the crowded store environment, and have the ability to explain the product or service in a split second's time. They are used to merchandise items that rank high in impulse sales. They persuade consumers to buy goods they had not planned to purchase. Adequately labeled and clearly priced products on display attract and influence even disinterested consumers.

Permanent P-O-P units are able to effectively compartmentalize and departmentalize the store area in a variety of ways:

- As department makers, they provide an attention-getting and special area for product presentation; they become a store within a store. They also help control inventory, prevent out-of-stock conditions and provide an excellent merchandising device necessary for complex lines and related items.
- Display racks provide high product visibility. They draw attention to a group of related items in a sub-department, and facilitate self-service by the customer.
- Permanent counter or shelf units bring shoppers' eyes to a specific product line that is being presented. Products being displayed are usually expensive and not bought on impulse. Literature racks attached to the unit provide customers with the option to take home sales brochures for further consideration. ☐

Merchandising Power

P-O-P ads make unique claims

John Heelan, Advertising Manager, Olympia Brewing Co. "We've used point-of-purchase materials for years to make rather unique claims for our products. When we introduced our version of the light beer, Olympia Gold, we found success with the brand. But when the market became flooded, we suffered like everyone else. Then we became the first brewery to show calorie comparison on point-of-purchase materials. Sales went instantly upward. At the point-of-purchase we could literally see consumers reading the message.

"We're finding a specific, new interest in point-of-purchase. It's not unlike any other medium. There was a time when you could sell anything on television, but that's not true anymore. We've found that cohesive ties with all our advertising, along with the development of point-of-purchase displays to reinforce the image and message, have always been successful.

"We recently did a study with point-of-purchase static and motion displays with advertised and unadvertised products. We measured figures against last year's sales and found some interesting results. There were significant increases and smaller stores responded better than some of the larger ones."□

Tough to make a buck, shops say

An Advertising Age roundup

Advertising agency executives are confident their billings figures will show some growth this year, but their positive projections are mixed with a shot of realism. Modest increases in client ad budgets may not be enough to counter the continually rising media and operations costs faced by agencies.

As articulated by O. Milton Gossett, chairman of Saatchi & Saatchi Compton Worldwide, the general feeling is, "It will be tougher than ever to make a buck in 1983."

A survey of agencies across the country shows that for the most part advertisers are committing to budgets; that budgets are increasing slightly or holding steady; that agencies are continuing to scrutinize out-of-pocket expenses but are not cutting back in the personnel area, and that new business remains the primary hope of agencies expecting to increase profits during the year.

In New York, the picture seems fairly bright. At Compton, for example, Mr. Gossett said Procter & Gamble, Johnson & Johnson, Thompson Medical, American Motors and Paine Webber are increasing spending. The agency's "smokestack industry" clients such as U.S. Steel and Phelps Dodge are being very cautious about their spending. For the year, Compton expects income to be up 15% to 18%, as compared to the 20% increase the agency enjoyed in 1982.

"Clients are displaying a continued commitment to the support of advertising budgets and programs," said William Phillips, chairman of Ogilvy & Mather, adding that some client budgets were up, some down, and some flat.

Though clients are committing monies beyond the first quarter, according to Jack Bowen, president of Benton & Bowles, there is still some cautiousness. "It's about at the same pace it has been for the past three or four months," Mr. Bowen said. "There had been some expectation around the media

Sterling bid gets $100 mil

By NANCY GIGES

New York—As Sterling Drug adds $100 million in advertising and promotion for its new headache remedies to the record spending already expected to push analgesics this year, pain relievers likely will become one of the most heavily advertised drug categories in history.

Sterling's Glenbrook Laboratories has prepared promotional materials for the trade that quote president Walter Camas promising a full commitment in supporting the new products.

This spending probably will be equaled if not exceeded by major rivals, American Home Products for its Anacin line and Johnson & Johnson for Tylenol. J&J's McNeil Consumer Products Co. has said it will spend 60% more in advertising than last year, a figure that totaled an estimated $45 million.

Sterling has positioned its new offerings, Panadol nonaspirin and an improved Bayer line (AA, Jan. 10), as providing "the right otc [over-the-counter] pain reliever for almost every need." The products all are handled by SSC&B.

Although the company wants consumers to perceive the selection as the only group of pain killers they need to consider, each product is getting a separate ad campaign,

ANA: Net syndication cost too high

By MAURINE CHRISTOPHER

The Assn. of National Advertisers will go before the Assn. of Independent TV Stations national convention Jan. 18 to spell out its opposition to allowing the major tv networks back into domestic syndication. It is expected to tell the friendly audience that lifting the Federal Communications Commission ban will cut back on media choices for advertisers, drive up network ad costs by weakening the spot-market competition and, ultimately, result in higher retail prices for consumers.

Although ANA board members did not want the speech that its immediate past chairman Thomas Ryan will deliver tomorrow in Los Angeles in print beforehand, the Gillette Co. executive apparently will emphasize the potentially adverse effects repeal of the FCC financial interest and syndication rules will have on the public, as viewers and product consumers, as well as sponsors and local telecasters.

The ANA board last week decided to follow the tv committee's recommendation (AA, Nov. 15) and oppose the networks' request for a lifting of the rules that ban the networks from domestic syndication and co-production. Mr. Ryan read the board a draft of the speech he will give for INTV.

In preparation for making its case, the ANA has put together a cost analysis for network, spot and local tv over the last 10 years. This study reportedly points out what repeal might do to weaken independent stations financially.

ANA's case will be presented in still greater detail in comments to be filed with the FCC before the Jan. 26 deadline. ABC, CBS and NBC have asked the commission to repeal the 13-year-old rules and allow them to compete freely with Time Inc., Westinghouse, Getty Oil and other corporate giants in programing for the old and new electronic media. The Big 3's drive to return to the $800 million domestic syndication business has been strengthened by the endorse-

D'Arcy moves to rescue N.Y. office

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

New York—In what appears to be a show of faith as well as a tangible shoring up of its struggling New York office, D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius Worldwide is moving its corporate headquarters here from Bloomfield Hills, Mich.

D'Arcy's Manhattan operation has been losing business at an alarming rate, and has been unsuccessful in landing major new business, giving rise to rumors that the agency was about to close the office.

In the past few months, DM&M/New York has lost its Lorillard tobacco business, Heublein's Lancers wine, Chambourcy yogurt from Nestle Co. and the Westinghouse corporate account. For all of 1982, it lost accounts totaling approximately $30 million in billings.

Counting some minor business picked up in the past year, D'Arcy said the office now bills about $70 million, down 22% from 1982 billings of about $90 million. Last year's New York billings accounted for about 8% of the agency's total billings of $1.1 billion, a much smaller percentage than most major agencies derive

'Jolt people into thinking trains'

Amtrak starts rolling with a new tv effort that attempts to "jolt . . . people into thinking trains," in the words of Joel Baumwoll, president of the Amtrak agency, NH&S/New York. This commercial juxtaposes the hustle of hurrying to the station (right) with the relaxation of a train ride. The $20 million drive includes heavy use of print advertising as well, initially spreads. The campaign is targeted directly at inducing airline travelers to riding the rails. (See story, Page 55.)

ALL ABOARD AMTRAK

Mobil's 'Nickleby' tops expectations

By DIANE MERMIGAS

The Mobil Showcase Network's long-awaited four-night broadcast of "The Life and Adventures of Nicholas Nickleby" on independent and affiliate stations eroded the commercial networks' usual audience shares and garnered higher ratings than anticipated.

The nine-hour Royal Shakespeare Company presentation of the Charles Dickens' drama last week averaged a 9.6 rating and 14 share (the first three nights) in the six markets where "Nickleby" aired that are metered for overnight viewer tabulations by A.C. Nielsen Co. Twenty-four of the 61 stations in 60 markets comprising Mobil's ad hoc network were affiliates that preempted ABC, CBS or NBC programing for the broadcast.

However, the show averaged declining ratings each night in the six metered markets (New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, Detroit, San Francisco and Philadelphia), drawing an 11.5 rating, 16 share the first night (Jan. 10); a 9.5 rating, 14 share Jan. 11, a 7.8 rating, 12 share Jan. 12 and a 7.8 rating, 12 share Jan. 13. The four-night average in the six markets was a respectable 9 rating, 13 share.

Mobil vp-public affairs Herb Schmertz said that response to the drama "exceeded our expectations." It was expected to average a 7 rating.

In New York, Chicago and Los Angeles, "Nickleby" generally finished third or fourth behind commercial network competition but drew as high as a 12 rating, 16 share in Chicago all four nights. Spokespersons for Chicago's WGN-TV and Metromedia-owned WNEW-TV, New York, and KTTV-TV, Los Angeles, said the special attracted ratings and shares slightly better than that generated by off-network series reruns and movies normally occupying the same time period.

The apparent syndicated success of "Nickleby" injected excitement into what otherwise continues to be a rather dull midseason race among the commercial networks.

CBS broke the monotony of its comfortable prime time lead last week long enough to announce the broadcast of nine new limited series (six comedies and three dramas) this spring as potential prospects for the fall 1983-84 season.

Seagram rum duels Bacardi

By GAY JERVEY

NEW YORK—Joseph E. Seagram & Sons will try to break its abysmal new-product record with a Feb. 1 national rollout of Captain Morgan's Spiced Rum, a dark version that is competitively priced with Bacardi.

Industry sources unanimously regard Captain Morgan's, actively tested in Maryland, Arizona, Houston and Boston, as the first promising distilled spirit innovation from Seagram in years. Indeed, Impact, the liquor industry newsletter, is forecasting that sales could eventually reach 1 million cases a year, a figure achieved by only about 40 brands.

As such, the company will plow substantial ad dollars into the rollout. For the first nine months of 1982, the company spent $507,400 in test—about

Agree, Glade, others up for grabs

Johnson, NH&S split over Clorox conflict

By JENNIFER ALTER

In an action that indicates NH&S/USA's Chicago office may be winning a little too much new business for its own good, the agency and S.C. Johnson & Son ended their relationship last week.

The split involved approximately $20 million in billings, including the Agree and Enhance haircare lines, Soft Sense skin lotion and Glade air fresheners. They have not been reassigned.

As Needham's oldest client, Johnson had been on the roster since 1929, except for an interruption from 1974 to 1977.

There is some discrepancy as to who really engineered the split. Although a Johnson spokesman said the agency and company "have agreed to dissolve their relationship," NH&S' statement said it resigned Johnson.

Whatever, the dispute centered around a Johnson policy prohibiting its agencies from handling other clients' brands in categories that compete with any brands in a Johnson division for which the agency does business.

Specifically, Johnson appears to have been upset by the Clorox business Needham won late last year (AA, Dec. 13). That assignment included Clorox Pre-Wash, which competes with Johnson's Shout. Although Needham did not have Shout, it did have Glade; both brands are in the company's household products division.

Under these terms, the agency needed only to resign Glade, but the policy apparently was too restrictive for Needham to swallow.

According to NH&S president Al Wolfe, "We really respect them and their right to operate on the policies which are the best for their business. But we have to run our own business, too."

The agency statement said the policy was "recently enunciated"; Johnson said the policy has been in effect for some time. A source at J. Walter Thompson USA, another Johnson agency, said he had not been notified of a "recently enunciated" policy.

Needham has been on a new-business hot streak. Earlier this month it was assigned a corporate campaign for Sears, Roebuck & Co.'s merchandising division, with a budget somewhere between $15 million and $40 million.

An added stimulus to Johnson's decision to implement its conflict policy at this time could be Clorox's success with the very product that caused the problem. Johnson's Shout has been hurt by the introduction of Pre-Wash. In mid-1982, Shout's share was down to 22% from 34%, and Pre-Wash had 22%.#

Three in shift

Y&R gets $15 million from AHP

By PAT SLOAN

NEW YORK—American Home Products' Whitehall Laboratories played musical chairs with its agency roster again last week, shifting assignments between agencies to lessen the sting of Young & Rubicam gaining $15 million in business formerly at three other shops.

After Y&R announced that it had been awarded Maximum Strength Anacin, Bronitin, Semicid, Sleep-Eze, Neet and Anbesol, it was learned that Kornhauser & Calene had been given Dristan Ultra Strength multisymptom cold tablets, Freezone, Dry & Clear and Cleansing Pads. William Esty Co. also got a new assignment tacked onto its Whitehall product roster in the form of Dristan nasal sprays.

The assignment of four of six products—Maximum Strength Anacin, Bronitin, Semicid and Sleep-Eze—to Y&R had been expected (AA, Jan. 10). Those brands were resigned by Rosenfeld, Sirowitz & Lawson in late 1982.

At the time of the resignation, RS&L management said the Sales sprout from the seeds of segmentation

By Jo Ann Paganetti

There's "Opulence" for the ordering of a new satin gown and a blue fox jacket to go over it. And a "Readers Choice" section of "The Best Report Newsletter" for the snobby acquiring of the best of anything.

Or, if you're more down home, consider the "Vermont Country Store" for old-fashioned stove blacking for your old-fashioned stove, or "Country Notebook" for a kit to stencil your walls in colonial patterns.

And if you're a "La Costa" catalog (directed to health enthusiasts) customer, Harrods of London feels that you're upscale enough and smart enough to translate today's pounds into today's dollars, and so one of the world's premier retailers offers its catalogs in the "La Costa" catalogs for "just $5."

Yes, the direct marketing industry has us segmented by sex and size and income, by interest and hobby and profession, by nationality and religion and brand loyalty, by urban or suburban or country residence, by the credit cards we use and the magazines we read, by the products we will be likely to buy, by recency, frequency and amounts of purchase.

In sharp contrast to the gloomy forecasts of many businesses, Robert F. DeLay, president of the Direct Marketing Assn. (DMA), reports that direct marketers can expect sales volume gains of about 15% when 1982's figures are tallied up and a doubling of annual sales in the next five years. Direct marketing sales volume equaled $125 billion in 1981. Total ad expenditures amounted to $25 billion.

According to Jules Silbert of the Silbert Group, New York, that growth figure will continue to be twice the rate of what retail would be if times are merry and bright. Mr. Silbert, who spent 20 years building the segmented-to-big-and-tall-women Lane Bryant catalog and retail operation, cites some reasons for his expectations: The growing majority of women who work outside the home and have less and less time to shop, the higher energy costs for the retailer and transportation costs for the customer and the customer's acceptance of the catalog as a reliable way to shop.

"Twenty years ago," says Mr. Silbert, "40% to 60% of our customers said they would shop by mail, now 60% to 80% say they would use catalogs."

Most experts agree that after "reliability," the next magic word to make direct marketing successful is "segmentation," having the right merchandise in the right presentation at the right time for the right customer. It's infinitely more profitable to reach 10 interested customers than to tell your story to 100 random prospects.

US MAIL
Direct Marketing

John Pirman

But unlike the Campari ads, direct marketers can't tell you the first time they segmented. The longtime professionals recall that Sears, Roebuck & Co. and Montgomery Ward & Co. did separate seed and farm equipment and work clothing catalogs "long before you were born." (Segmentation by merchandise.) And they'll tell you that from 1930 to 1940, a period of low profits, low average orders and relatively low sales volume, the large American mail order companies decided to reduce costs by controlling catalog circulation by the recency-frequency monetary method. (Segmentation by mailing lists).

But it was the marketers of the 1970s, the "Great Life Stylers," who gave us segmentation by presentation. Of course, America's retailers developed life style to a state of the art. The same style sweater can be presented by classic Brooks Brothers and contemporary Bloomingdale's in their respectively classic and contemporary catalogs and may sell to two totally different customers.

Bob Stone, chairman of Stone & Adler, Chicago, and a direct marketer since 1938, says that wholehearted segmentation began in the 1960s with the introduction of the computer in business. "What we did before that was geographic segmentation," he says. "We would take a country or a state. But you couldn't get lists by postal zones. That only came with Zip-coding."

John Naisbitt, author of "Megatrends," a book that made the New York Times best sellers list and chairman of the Naisbitt Group, a Washington-based research and consulting company, agrees: "Just as highways and roads have promoted more cars, the computer has been a tool that has promoted more complexity and segmentation. Direct marketers are at the forefront of where everybody is going to be. We can all learn from them."

Are there any problems with segmentation? Mr. Naisbitt sees none. What about segmentation canceling out other choices? What if I've been an almond lover for years and buy from an almond catalog? One day, I break a tooth on an almond and never went to see another California nut!

Mr. Naisbitt says there is a market segment for the universal. Once I've made an inquiry (probably through an 800 phone number or letter in response to a newspaper or magazine ad or a cable spot), I may be on to a universal food binge with my choice of pecans or pasta.

I can also take my case to Catalogia, a network of new stores in which shoppers can locate catalogs offering merchandise by computer and then take the catalogs they select into lounging areas to review and shop.

And what about the overpruning of lists? What about the customer who feels neglected and unloved because his favorite catalog company didn't send him a Christmas catalog? Is that segmented listing gone wrong? According to George Burman, vp-marketing with Talbots, the direct marketer that segments to the classic clothing customer, the constant purging of lists is vital. "If anything, many marketers can [make an] error in the other direction—keeping on too many inactives," says Mr. Burman.

In listings, there seems no end to the logic games that can be played with information in the old database. Connecticut direct mail expert, Pierre Passavant, in his seminars for the DMA and others, shows that demographics and product affinity also work as segmentation factors for successful direct marketing.

Joel Jensen, vp-operations with Arthur D. Little, Cambridge, Mass., a consulting company that works with Sears in the catalog circulation area and with other clients on segmentation, explains that with the latest in computer matching providing higher speeds and lower costs, lists can be constructed in even more detail. A list broker might find it worthwhile to match lists and rent the third list as a still better list.

Mr. Jensen also suggests the reverse of a present matching technique as a new angle. Find an outside list that matches the target you are trying to reach, he says. Match it against your own house names. Then, as opposed to using the remaining outside names for market extension, use only the house names that match the outside list for target refinement.

Clay Johnson, director of marketing with Horchow, Dallas, offers what seems to be the only caution direct marketers have about segmentation: "The challenge is to refine our offering and still get a list big enough to offset the high cost of producing the catalog."

In 1982, that refining at Horchow meant segmentation of merchandise and presentation in three new areas with special catalogs for "Fine Linens," "Practicalities" (practical items) and "Another Perspective" (younger merchandise). In 1983, Mr. Johnson says, Horchow will make special offerings to "only our very best customers."

Even a mass-advertising giant like TWA turns to segmentation, with 11% of its total budget spent in direct mail projects, including the "Frequent Flier Bonus" program. "We are so refined," says Nicholas Michael, manager of direct marketing for the airline, "that we can segment and identify our travelers by in-

Just what the customer ordered

By Robert Ebisch

"During this whole turnaround, I have never had a sleepless night," says Henry A. Johnson, president of Spiegel Inc. "I never carry problems home. I don't even worry about them. If you have the right input and calculate the probabilities, what difference does it make whether it's a $20 decision or a $2 million decision?"

Spiegel president Henry Johnson has demanded and received a free hand on the company's controls.

In fact, the turnaround to which Mr. Johnson refers involved far greater sums. Since his hiring as Spiegel's president in 1976, Mr. Johnson has demanded and received a free hand on the $500 million company's controls. He ejected $40 million worth of time-honored mail order products, including automobile tires, batteries, sump pumps and basic low-price furniture from the Spiegel catalog. He replaced them with fashions by Bill Blass and Perry Ellis.

Mr. Johnson completely restructured Spiegel's management and then took it through the closing of the company's free-standing order stores, which generated 40% of the company's business at 170 locations around the country. He replaced most of the company's buyers and cut the total number of employes from 7,000 to 3,500 within three years.

As a result, Spiegel has ceased to be what he calls a "price-oriented store of last resort," offering low-price merchandise to "people who bought from us because they could get credit." The new value-oriented Spiegel replaced it, aiming designer clothes and department store merchandise at working women from 25 to 54 years old with household incomes of $34,000 and up. Admirers call the spectacular transformation daring; others call it a gamble.

SPIEGEL
CHICAGO 9, ILLINOIS

The old "price oriented" catalog . . .

Relaxed in his big brick-and-shake home on two green acres of the Ginger Creek subdivision of Oak Brook, Ill., one recent Saturday morning, Mr. Johnson attempts to explain why Spiegel's changes are nothing more than the logical outcome of good research, planning and self-confidence. Through the windows one can see ducks paddling tranquiliy where the property fronts the edge of the subdivision's lake.

"In developing a strategy and following it through," Mr. Johnson says, "you can't have all the safe things you used to have. If they don't fit the strategy, they'll destroy the probability that it will work. You'll always have people saying, 'How can we afford to give up tires? We sell $12 million of them.' Well, tires don't fit."

What did fit was the sale of big name designers to a national urban market, not just in the 25 or 30 largest cities. The sophistication and economic strength of the modern woman is a national phenomenon, even in the small cities, Mr. Johnson asserts. With women moving toward equal pay for equal work, filling the universities, the era of the old-fashioned housewife disappearing, working women all over the country want the better products, he says, but they don't have time to drive 70 miles to the nearest excuse for an urban center to try to find them.

"I could see the opportunity coming to serve these life style changes," he says. "I saw it when I was at Aldens," where Mr. Johnson was an executive vp until 1974, "but nine out of ten people there were skeptics. I've never been a skeptic; I've always had a positive attitude."

You can't have all the safe things you used to have," says Mr. Johnson.

In some ways, Mr. Johnson reminds one of a football coach, says Alton Withers, Spiegel's vp-finance. "Hank is animated, very intense in business because he gets so wound up with enthusiasm," says Mr. Withers. "And he's able to translate his understanding and enthusiasm to people who work for him. Segments dividual city-pair [to and from destinations] and class of service in order to more effectively target a particular message."

But segmentation isn't just print presentation and the spinning of computers. The DMA made that evident when it took the "mail" out of its name last November at its national convention in California. John C. Holt, chairman of the DMA and executive vp with Dun & Bradstreet, says: "The name change makes it clear that our method of doing business can be used in any medium—print, broadcast, telephone, mail."

Because cable tv narrowcasting concept closely resembles direct marketing's segmentation, one would think there would be a match made in heaven. Sometimes, yes. Sometimes, it's dig in and wait.

Fred Schwartzfarb, manager of direct response at Entertainment & Sports Programming Network, the 24-hour sports cable network, is enthusiastic about the segmentation abilities of his network. He believes he has the red-blooded male audience captured.

ESPN has case study after case study of direct marketing successes. There's Pro, the National Football League magazine. When ESPN showed the NFL draft, "in the middle of the day, in the middle of a work week," it got 6,000 phone calls for subscription on its 800 number over a day-and-a-half's worth of programing. Mr. Schwartzfarb will also tell you his "Keeper Bait Fish Formula" story. A total of 850 bottles of the stuff, used to lure fish, were sold in the first day of advertising on ESPN. Since July, Fish Formula continues to sell at around 200 bottles a week.

Mr. Schwartzfarb also dispels the theory that a direct marketing pitch need be two minutes. "A lot of the younger marketers are doing 60s and 90s [60- and 90-second commercials] on cable, and they work just as well," he says. "I've even seen a 30 that works. The guy just comes on and gives you the price for the next six months of the Wall Street Journal and then lists the 800 number."

Another direct marketer, one that is segmenting to the working woman, is planning a consistent cable program in coordination with its catalog effort. New York's Direct Marketing Group introduced its "Access" catalog three ways: In an extensive mailing list of 210,000 working women gleaned from 29 lists, by insertion in the October issue of Harper's Bazaar (a magazine with a profile readership heavily slanted to the working woman) and by a 30-minute shopping show called "Access to the World."

According to Ed Kessler, president of the company's electronic marketing division, the least responsive medium was cable, "which came as no surprise." The second print catalog is now being sold to vendors, and Mr. Kessler plans to continue with a second cable program.

But marketers like Pierre Passavant warn that "we can become so segmentation oriented we don't see the illogic of some cable advertising where the audiences are so small, they're not worthwhile."

Mr. Johnson is a Chicago native of long-standing. Both parents emigrated from Norway in the second decade of this century and met in Chicago. Mr. Johnson was raised in Park Ridge, Ill., where his father and uncle worked together as carpenters. His mother was a cleaning lady for some of the wealthier homes in the area, and Mr. Johnson got his start in business doing yardwork for some of her employers.

"She taught me to work hard, the principles of being honest and doing a good job," recalls Mr. Johnson. "I think I can honestly say that in every job I've ever had, I did a better job than anybody else."

Recurring in descriptions of Mr. Johnson by business associates is the statement that he practices leadership through example.

"He goes at his work like a bulldog," says Edward C. Jacobs executive director of the Chicago Council of the Boy Scouts of America, where Mr. Johnson served as president from 1978 to 1980. "He inspires confidence by knowing what he's doing. But he's not overbearing. After you talk to him a few minutes, it seems like he's been your friend

Between the pages of a turnaround

By Rick Murray

In 1976, the year Henry Johnson became its president, Spiegel Inc. was a weak fourth in a field of four general merchandise catalog companies, with net sales of $268 million.

As 1982 drew to a close, estimated net sales totaled $400 million, with pretax profits of $10.5 million, a 16% improvement from 1981, according to Alton Withers, vp-finance at Spiegel.

"It's got to be one of the greatest turnaround stories in the mail order business," says Maxwell Sroge, a mail order industry analyst and president of Maxwell Sroge Publishing, Colorado Springs, Colo. "Over the past 15 years there has been a dramatic shift from general merchandise catalogs to specialty catalogs, but Spiegel is the only general merchandise catalog to capitalize on the specialty concept while maintaining its general merchandise coverage.

"It isn't the idea," says Mr. Sroge. "It's the execution. Spiegel has executed very well."

Most of that execution can be attributed to Henry Johnson. With the broad powers given him, Mr. Johnson committed Spiegel to a marketing program aimed at the "upscale, busy lady," the working woman with a household income above $34,000. This decision was based on Spiegel's demographic studies which showed that 50% of all American women worked outside the home and that the figure would grow to 70% by the end of the decade.

... the new "value oriented" catalog.

Converting from an operation that provides useful merchandise on easy credit for the rural and low income customer to one that emphasizes designer fashions for the upscale working woman also required streamlined management and operations. Flat line management, reporting directly to Mr. Johnson, replaced the earlier pyramid structure, and improved customer service and shipping speeded response.

But the key to the new philosophy was upgrading Spiegel's catalog and its image. "People are still not sure they want to buy $100 blouses by mail," says Richard Wagner, senior vp of Burson-Marsteller, the public relations and advertising agency that landed the Spiegel account in 1981. "We are trying to sell the concept of the new Spiegel more than its merchandise. There is a lot of education yet to do, which is why Spiegel uses guest editors in its catalog and why so many of the photos are shot on location."

Marsteller's approach has been innovative in several ways. The most striking is the flip technique, which appeared in spring, 1982. The catalog has a glossy women's fashion cover on one side and, when flipped over, a glossy home furnishing cover on the other. Mr. Wagner explains that the separation of the book into two sections with two covers, "Fashion World" and "House World," eases customer shopping and ensures that an attractive cover is always showing.

"We want customers to put this catalog on their coffee tables as they would fashion magazines, instead of on top of their refrigerators," says Mr. Wagner. "We have to have exquisite reproduction." For this reason, the new catalogs have better color and design, heavier than usual stock and improved printing.

Marsteller also has experimented with test 30-second tv spots, an idea that makes many direct marketing segmentation. Barbara Zeiger, vp of member services for the Television Bureau of Advertising, suggests buys that segment the mass giant by viewer receptivity to the direct marketing message.

"The first quarter is a traditionally good time for the direct marketer, and it is also the best buy of the year on tv," she advises. Ms. Zeiger also points out that direct marketers do their best at time parts other advertisers find least desirable: In early fringe and in lower-rated programs like movies and reruns of sitcoms.

Because Broadcast Advertisers Report doesn't break down direct marketing figures, there's no complete reading on how much direct marketing takes place over the air. DMA, however, lists tv as fourth in total direct marketing ad expenditures for 1981 at $295 million.

Telephone marketing is a significant first with $11.5 billion (which includes expenditures for 800 numbers); direct mail is second with $10.6 billion and newspaper preprints is third with $2.3 billion. While direct marketers happily and successfully segment in all media, there is still another player in the game left to be acknowledged: The customer! In the future, he will get to "segment" for himself.

Mr. Naisbitt, the author of "Megatrends," finds that the trend to "the customer in charge" is an important one. In his book, he refers to the reader becoming his own editor; and marketing may well be one step ahead of editorial with "The Cableshop," the cable test sponsored by the Adams-Russell Co. and J. Walter Thompson USA, in Peabody, Mass.

In the test, the viewer selects the message he wants to see. According to "Cableshop" director John Pollock, approximately 60% of the clients are using some kind of "direct action call."

Ron Kaatz, senior vp-director of media resources and research with Thompson in Chicago, reports that "Cableshop" is scheduled to roll out to 250,000 more cable homes in other locations sometime in 1983.

So the future of segmentation may well be in our own message selection (in print catalog-and-computer projects like Catalogia or in cable shows like "Cableshop" with telephone hookups). Or in home videotex systems, where we can take our shopping problems to our own friendly terminals. After all, there's nothing like the feeling of power you can get when you tell the computer that you've had enough "down home" and you're ready for "Opulence," please.

Cultivating the direct marketing professional

It takes devotion to star-raising

By Joanne Cleaver

No wild west outlaw was ever wanted as much as a talented, experienced direct marketer is wanted today by the business' agencies.

A business that's growing about twice as fast as the rest of the retail segment has to be hungry for good people; the crunch is that the business has taken off so quickly that it has left behind a talent vacuum.

There's no lack of "superstar" free lancers who can name their fees, say business insiders. And hundreds of college students are enthusiastic about the field.

To keep them enthusiastic, the Direct Marketing Assn. (DMA) has just introduced the first full-fledged direct marketing major at the University of Missouri at Kansas City. But those students won't be available for at least two years, if they're in a graduate program.

In the meantime, the talent vacuum is sucking inexperienced advertising people into direct marketing agencies, which are then left with the burden of training their people—with no guarantee that they won't leave in a couple of years for a $10,000 pay raise across the street.

In the meantime, the talent vacuum is sucking inexperienced advertising people into direct marketing agencies, which are then left with the burden of training their people.

Direct marketing has been the ugly duckling of the advertising world for so long that it's not surprising that, now that it has finally grown up, there's a shortage of good people. Most college textbooks devote just a page or two to "junk mail," says one old-timer.

Many industry insiders say that even they just "fell into" the field.

Joan Throckmorton, president of Throckmorton Associates, New York, says that "in the '50s and '60s it was practically not respectable to be a direct marketing copywriter." Consequently, all the good people got their training at magazines and book club publishers, whose marketing strategies depended entirely on direct mail.

"There was no other place to learn," she recalls.

By the mid-1970s, when direct marketing was beginning to mushroom, many of these experienced writers went out on their own, having advanced as far as they could in traditional agen-

Dialing

cost of having someone front calls is worth it."

Mr. Durbec described three ways telemarketers can use his company's TBS-9500. In the first, computers and automatic dialing equipment route and place calls and track results, but once contact is made, the live operator takes over and conducts the call.

That kind of system works best for market research and business that demands "the intelligent aggressive presence of a person," Mr. Durbec says.

The second option allows the operator to introduce the call and get agreement to the "conversation" before releasing the call to the recording.

Mr. Durbec says the recorded message consists of a series of sentences designed to involve the listener's participation. "We manage the sentences to ensure that we simulate a conversation so we get the emotion and results of a conversation," he says. "You'd be surprised that everybody talks to us, quite naturally and quite frequently for a long period."

The third option starts out just as the second, with the operator introducing the call and the prerecorded voice imparting the sales message.

At the end, though, the machine turns the call back over to the live operator for closing the sale.

Why bother with all that expensive equipment if operators must still get involved? Mr. Durbec says the machines do the repetitive tasks—calling the numbers, waiting for an answer, making repeated attempts where there's no answer and taking care of the simpler part of the telephone conversation.

"If the caller did everything," he says, "that person would spend a maximum of 15 to 20 minutes of each hour talking. Much of the rest of the time would be spent in retrieval of numbers, dialing and waiting. In high volume calling, machines can do those things efficiently."

cies, she says.

Consequently, the field is now dominated by "copy stars" who can command high fees because they can prove that their stuff works.

Even the large direct marketing agencies still bring in outside stars.

"It's a very strange situation," observes Ms. Throckmorton. "All the top writers are free lancers. I don't think people are wrong at all to use them. I just think it's sad that we don't have a growing star system, or that agencies aren't known for their stars."

The problem is a self-perpetuating one because even if an agency does spend several years developing a writer, he or she can walk out at anytime he or she wants.

Substantial salaries—exorbitant, say some industry insiders—are often the only way to keep these writers.

"We do have a problem. I can suggest only partial solutions," says Ms. Throckmorton. Her concerns are echoed by others in the business who feel harassed and frazzled by the constant search for new talent and the tensions of holding on to the people they've got.

Direct marketing has been the ugly duckling of the advertising world for so long that it's not surprising that, now that it has finally grown up, there's a shortage of good people.

That general advertising people don't always transplant well to a direct marketing job only exacerbates the problem.

George Wiedemann, president of Grey Direct, New York, says the best direct marketing people don't come from traditional advertising agencies.

"An agency person knows how to be an agency person; there aren't many that are well rounded and familiar with the full scope of media needed for working in direct marketing," he says.

"It's easier to get marketing people from the client environment; they already know how to deal with the media, and you can teach them how to work in an ad agency."

With the superstars at the top calling their own shots, and the eager beavers at the bottom, craving attention and training, there's a big gap in the middle.

Middle managers, supervisors, senior writers and artists with three to eight years' experience in direct marketing—all tomorrow's potential stars—are the rarest of all.

One obvious way to get talent is to develop it.

The inhouse training program, always a mainstay of a direct marketing agency, is becoming crucial to its very survival.

If an agency can't develop its own talent, instead of trying to continually steal talent from other companies, it will do nothing but perpetuate the high-price star system.

Mr. Wiedemann recognized that problem several years ago, and has carefully organized Grey Direct's structure to make sure that these valuable middle-level people are given enough money and creative challenges to both stay at Grey Direct and feel personally fulfilled.

Most of his department heads have 15 years of experience. The next tier of managers has five to eight years. It's their job to develop the junior people.

The inhouse training program, a mainstay of a direct marketing agency, is becoming crucial to its very survival.

Mr. Wiedemann's solution to the problem of career development for beginners and middle people is the "First Friday" program.

The first Friday of every month is devoted to seminars on whatever aspect of direct marketing Mr. Wiedemann and his staff believe are in need of attention.

Most are conducted by inhouse experts; for others, outside suppliers are brought in.

Over-all, the approach is "a structured presentation in a loose atmosphere," says Mr. Wiedemann.

One recent seminar on marketing plans from a direct marketing point of view was given by the person who writes the best marketing plans. Another, put on by outside printers, demonstrated recent breakthroughs in integrated computer personalization of letters as long as eight pages.

Most of the seminars focus on the technical side of direct marketing, says Mr. Wiedemann. Because most of his junior people have a general advertising background, he says, "they have to be schooled in the 'transaction system' that moves consumers to buy.

"It's not enough for a writer or artist to just know copy or art."

Ms. Throckmorton carries inhouse training one step further—she is devoted to the art of becoming a mentor to talented newcomers.

"There are a million little things you have to pass on when you're teaching direct marketing," she observes. "When you have the rule down, you have the ability to do a technically correct direct marketing package. Consequently, it all sounds the same--'here,' 'new,' 'sale,' 'free,' 'order today.'

Seminars are fine, but without individual attention, few direct marketing newcomers will rise above a textbook approach to exploit the medium's creative aspects.

A person who is technically correct will be very successful in direct marketing, in a good market, but the minute the market becomes marginal, or the price a little competitive, you have to be more than technically correct, you have to have creativity," says Ms. Throckmorton.

Seminars and workshops are all fine and well, she says, but without individual attention, few direct marketing newcomers will rise above a textbook approach to exploit the creative aspects of the medium.

Ms. Throckmorton, who has been a successful mentor to three copywriters, says she talks to 75 to 100 potential writers a year to find "maybe two who have the talent and are willing to put in the time."

This continual screening is crucial to her ability to pick out and hire top talent. When an agency doesn't constantly review people and keep in contact with them, it won't be able to find a talented person when it needs to fill a position within two weeks, she says.

Those practicing the traditional methods of fostering talent—inhouse training and acting as mentors—may soon have a much wider pool of beginners to draw on.

The DMA has been pouring much of its energy and money into establishing direct marketing as a course, and now a major, on college campuses across the country.

While some in the business are doubtful about the practicality of such programs, pointing out that they won't eliminate the need for inhouse training, most others are enthusiastic about the prospect of their raw talent being a little less raw.

According to Richard Montesi, president of the Direct Marketing Educational Institute (DMEI), the whole point of the DMA's efforts is to help beginners get off on the right foot in the business, "so they don't have to start accidentally, as so many people do."

Although the DMEI has established several types of programs, ranging from all-expense-paid week-long introductory seminars for professors to summer internships at New York agencies for undergraduates, its latest and most significant accomplishment is the direct marketing major at the University of Missouri at Kansas City.

graduates will be able to enroll in the major, which is designed to emphasize a systems approach, integrating basic economic and business education with the "why" of direct marketing, says Mr. Montesi.

The course's text, the first ever in the field, is being written by Martin Baier, vp-marketing with the Old American Insurance Co., Kansas City, and an adjunct professor at the UMKC.

Mr. Baier is working out the specifics of the program, which he says will include 12 hours of direct marketing courses out of the 36 hours of business classes required for an MBA.

Much of the course material is to be modeled after successful projects conducted by Mr. Baier in the direct marketing courses he has been teaching at the school for the past several years.

He is especially enthusiastic about the students' ability to use the business theory they learn in introductory courses to develop specific direct marketing packages. The assignment he gave last fall's class, for example, was based on a Harvard Business School case study of the L.L. Bean catalog.

Those practicing the traditional methods of fostering talent—inhouse training and acting as mentors—may soon have a much wider pool of beginners to draw on.

The project teams were to develop a new market segment for the company, using the existing product line but differentiating it for their market segment and positioning it for the segment. They had to develop a marketing strategy, pick the appropriate media, write the copy and use mathematical analysis techniques to find out the value of each new customer.

It's just this kind of detail that engrosses business students in direct marketing, says Mr. Baier.

"The person who enrolls in the MBA program likes the science of marketing," he says.

"They see direct marketing as completely measurable and accountable. No student will come out of my course and spend $360,000 on ads for the Super Bowl, because that can't be measured," Mr. Baier says.

The DMEI's timing for the new major could hardly be better. High unemployment and soaring educational costs are forcing students to take a cost-analysis approach to their schooling.

Add to that the "sex appeal" of a relatively new and fast-growing business, and it doesn't take an MBA to figure out where the jobs are.

Students feel comfortable with the concept; they don't have preconceived notions of hucksterism.

Two additional factors attract students to direct marketing: Its use of new technologies and the ability to track the actual performance of a package.

They're also familiar with direct marketing through catalogs and tv; so, say business insiders, the students feel comfortable with the concept.

They don't have preconceived notions of hucksterism or COD ripoffs.

One direct marketer brings the concept even closer to home.

Freeman Gosden Jr., president of Smith/Hemmings/Gosden of El Monte, Cal., says that when he lectures to students at the University of California, he urges them to use direct marketing techniques to market themselves. That recommendation gets them very interested in the field. ■

Research Expo in '82, a record, and they found 10% more exhibitor booths than in '81 and 48 research company presentations, up from 42 in '81. The bottom line is that the ARF, which had been in serious financial difficulty in 1980, showed a surplus of about $300,000 on operations in 1982, largely due to the successful conference program.

RESEARCH NONEVENT OF THE YEAR: The Market Research Council Hall of Fame. If you're one of the many, many people who have never heard of the MRC or who did not realize that since 1977 this organization had inducted two researchers (one living, one posthumously) into what it calls The Research Hall of Fame, you'll understand why I nominate the 1982 induction ceremony at a private luncheon meeting at the Yale Club in New York on June 18 as the "nonevent of the year." The MRC is a private luncheon club founded by a group of distinguished researchers more than 60 years ago. Each year, MRC's awards committee selects the new hall inductees and the membership (which is limited to 80 people) votes.

Now it's wonderful, in my opinion, that there is a Research Hall of Fame, and I in no way want to denigrate the individuals who have been tapped to date. But I do suggest that if the honor is to be really meaningful, widely publicized and widely recognized, it has to be rooted in more than the opinion of a tiny handful of people who belong to a private luncheon club in New York. The honorees deserve something more: For instance, an open-to-all luncheon in the ballroom of a major hotel with representatives of all interested organizations—CASRO, AAPOR, AMA, MRA, et al.—in attendance and concurrence. Then the event should be properly publicized. Only then will the honorees have gotten their just deserts, and MRC could proudly take credit for getting the thing started.

RESEARCH COMPANY PROMOTER OF THE YEAR: A joint award to Judith S. Corson and Jeffrey L. Pope, the partners who run Custom Research Inc. in Minneapolis. CRI has created some of the most imaginative—and memorable—promotion mailings that the research industry has ever seen. One piece, a 35-by-23-in. poster, was a marketing research game board, similar to Parcheesi, where a player might land on a box inscribed "Coverage of airplane hijacking preempts tv programing on the night of your planned on-air ad test—go back four spaces" or "Blindside problem. . .company president's wife tries product and gets diarrhea—go back two spaces," and so on. Another poster, "Great Quotes from Marketing Research History," has characterizations of famous persons saying, as in the case of Harry Truman, "If you can't stand the heat, get out of the focus group viewing room." Will Rogers says, "I never met a client I didn't like." This sort of thing, some might say, is a mite whimsical for the staid old research business, but I find it clever, imaginative and amusing—qualities the industry could use a dash of now and then. So, to CRI, the No. 1 Banana Award of 1982.

Advertising expenditure estimates for various nations this year range from a high of 5% to a 30% drop for Mexico.

Foreign ad growth in '83 promising for many U.S. agencies

An Advertising Age roundup

U.S. advertising agencies are anticipating surprisingly strong growth outside the U.S. in 1983, although there may be share-of-market shifts among multinational agencies battling for the spoils of marketers' conservative ad spending increases.

That's the consensus of an ADVERTISING AGE survey of international agency, media and company executives in the U.S., as well as Japan, Australia, Canada, Great Britain, Germany, France, Brazil, South Africa and Mexico. In most cases, advertisers expect the first half of the year to show slower growth than the second half, when they expect a modest recovery.

Real growth in ad spending, with inflation factored out, seems to be strongest in Australia, Britain and Brazil, at 5%, and Japan and South Africa, at 4.5%. Even Latin America, a trouble spot for many agencies, is expected to show real growth except for Mexico, although the risks are greatest in the region for devaluations and governments' defaulting on loans.

The slowest growth is expected in Europe, where France and Germany are expecting little increase in ad spending. And Germany, for years the reliable "engine" of U.S. marketers' European growth, faces a potential change in government and an uncertain consumer spending environment.

Nevertheless, agencies are expecting international increases in ad billings ranging from 8% to as high as 20%. "The last half of 1982 was rough," says Jerry Roberts, senior vp-international of Young & Rubicam, "but as this year progresses it seems to be getting better and better." Y&R's estimate of real international growth, at 8%, is labeled "conservative" by some. "This is seen as a year of getting back to normal," he says. "There's a feeling that the economies of Western Europe and Latin America aren't going to get any worse."

Denis Lanigan, vice-chairman of J. Walter Thompson Co., is looking for 15% to 16% real growth outside the U.S., including an astonishing 40% in Latin America, 17% in Canada and 15% in Europe. Mr. Lanigan is unwilling to say the advertising industry is

McCann, client funds back ad hoc film net

By CRAIG REISS

To establish a national alternative to network tv prices and to compensate for declining network prime time audiences, McCann-Erickson is setting up an ad hoc network of independent stations to show prime time feature films.

McCann says it will commit millions of its clients' dollars to the purchase of syndication rights to recent-release theatrical movies if the independents clear a regular prime time block for its weekly ad hoc network.

Announcing the project at the Assn. of Independent Television Stations convention in Los Angeles last week, Gene DeWitt, exec vp-U.S. media services director, announced that McCann clients would pay for the movie rights, clear the stations and then trade the rights for advertising time in the films. The movies would be distributed directly to the independents after a run on pay cable services and would bypass the tv networks.

Under the plan, McCann clients would have first options on the advertising time, with the rest being sold on the open market by the movie supplier. Mr. DeWitt said initial advertiser reaction to the proposal has been uniformly positive, and it is probable that all commercial minutes would be absorbed by McCann clients. This development would provide McCann with the exclusive ability to place advertisers on what could be highly-rated independent fare.

One of the studios expected to cooperate with the project is Columbia Pictures, owned by Coca-Cola Co., a major McCann client. However, Mr. DeWitt denied reports that the project was being put

Colgate, Kao near deal

By NANCY GIGES and JACK BURTON

Colgate-Palmolive and Japan's Kao Soap Co. are close to signing a broad agreement for joint ventures in the U.S. that would boost Colgate's stagnant personal care business and finally give Kao the toehold here it has long desired.

A spokeswoman at Colgate's New York headquarters would not comment on the report, but G.D. Harrison, Colgate representative in Tokyo, said the two companies are "working on and planning many projects in the U.S." He added that it can be assumed the projects include haircare products; the two have been working together in that area for some time.

Reports that the companies might sign a deal for co-production in the U.S. as early as next month "may be a little premature," Mr. Harrison said.

Executives at some of Colgate's U.S. ad agencies said they are aware that there is work being done on haircare items coming from Japan. It is not clear whether Splendor, a new shampoo on which Colgate has asked several agencies to work (AA, Sept. 27), is part of that. Those shops include William Esty Co., North Castle Partners and BrainReserve, but no agency of record has been assigned.

An earlier joint venture between the two companies, the U.S. introduction in 1980 of a product called Hair Defense, was not successful. Hair Defense was a system that consisted of a shampoo and brush, sold separately or as a set. It was positioned in test markets as protecting the outer layer of the hair shaft from damage and giving it shine and manageability. One aim

Four A's, ANA differ on net syndication impact

By MAURINE CHRISTOPHER and RICHARD L. GORDON

Television's Big 3 are seen as benefiting from an advertising community split over the red-hot issue of network participation in domestic syndication and prime time co-production.

The split centers around separate opinions on this issue now being enunciated by the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies and the Assn. of National Advertisers.

The Four A's, in filing comments with the Federal Communications Commission, will agree that these network strictures probably should be repealed, but not at this time. The ad agencies, which placed $14.5 billion worth of tv advertising last year, want the FCC to review the situation annually in light of the gains being made by the new video forms.

The Four A's believes FCC should be prepared to act promptly to lift the barriers if the networks appear to be losing their ability to compete with pay cable for programing. It cites five factors FCC should keep in mind as it monitors the situation and moves toward repeal: Share of total viewing held by the networks, extent of real competition among tv program purchasers, changes in penetration levels of cable and the other new media forms, extent of the use of original programing by pay tv and the general financial condition of the networks.

By contrast, the agencies' clients, speaking through the ANA, last week unequivocally urged the retention of both rules before the Assn. of Independent Television Stations' national convention (AA, Jan. 17). The ANA says retention of the rules would stave off further network concentration of the tv advertising market at a time when more competition is just beginning to emerge. It suggested a review in four years to see if the marketplace had become "truly competitive."

Four A's senior vp Robert Purcell saw "no major incompatibility" between the Four A's and ANA positions. "I have seen some of the ANA drafts; they will be less emphatic about the inevitability of deregulation," he said. "We see it more likely to come sooner than they do."

ANA's formal FCC statement cites three major reasons for opposing the networks' request. The sponsors warn that repeal would "harm the independent tv stations and the newer media such as cable and the superstations, reduce the public's viewing options and make tv advertising less effective, less efficient and more costly."

The higher advertising costs would be particularly damaging for smaller marketers, who can't afford network tv, the ANA noted.

Jan. 26 is the deadline for the initial round of comments on the networks' petition to be allowed to compete unfettered in programing,

FCB buys Philly's Lewis & Gilman

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

Still intent on achieving growth through acquisition, Foote, Cone & Belding is buying Lewis & Gilman, Philadelphia's largest agency. The agency will be merged with FCB's Aitkin-Kynett subsidiary, which is that city's fourth-largest agency. Terms were not disclosed.

Since the final legal and financial details are still being worked out, the merger is not expected to be completed until late March or early April. Robert Wilder, 62, president of Lewis & Gilman, becomes chairman-chief executive officer of the new Philadelphia agency, as yet without a name, while John Newhall, 49, chairman of Aitkin-Kynett, becomes president-chief operating officer.

The merged operation will have combined billings of more than $90 million, about $60 million of that coming from L&G. "The two agencies together really add up to a

New York—Ken Segall has a leg up on most of his fellow apartment seekers here. In a city where rentals seemingly are about as common as job openings in Detroit, the Chiat/Day copywriter was able to make a direct appeal via a page ad in the New York Times last week.

Run on standby, the ad cost $8,000. But Mr. Segall didn't have to reach into his own pockets to pay for his plea. His need for a new apartment was partially the result of his agency's moving downtown to lower Fifth Avenue, so the agency paid for the ad written by Mr. Segall.

In the ad, the agency's move was heralded and several plugs were made for new business, all as humorously as possible.

The copy concludes, "So please if you know of any apartments, call me at the office. The new number is 807-4000. And if you need advertising that's great instead of just good, call Jay Chiat. Same number. He'll be happy to talk to you about your business. He's got time to. He's not looking for a place to live."

Mr. Segall has received 50 calls on apartments and "at least 25 other

Coors sets full-bodied beer brand

By ROBERT REED

Adolph Coors Co. plans to introduce a new premium-price beer, one that possesses a heavier, more full-bodied taste than the lighter Coors flagship.

The new beer is designed to be a major component of the brewer's market expansion, now in progress with its southeastern push. Company officials declined comment.

Additionally, Miller Brewing Co. has approved a new advertising campaign for its Special Reserve superpremium and is scheduling production of the brand again, according to an industry source. There is a possibility that, as part of the new look, the beer has been renamed. That could not be confirmed at press time; Miller would not comment on the brand.

The name of the new Coors brew is still to be determined, but the company's Chicago agency, Foote Cone & Belding, is working on test market advertising, sources say. The beer will be introduced into the Southeast areas where the Golden, Colo., brewer is now concentrating its efforts.

The debut of another Coors premium beer marks a strategy shift for the brewer, since that price po-

DDB study shows concerns over economy

Consumers seek security

New York—Consumers in America's middle generation—the 25-to-49-year-olds—feel they're "sliding down the economic scale" faster than at any time in the past two years. Still, they are guardedly optimistic about the future, according to a Doyle Dane Bernbach study.

Conducted by DDB's research and marketing services department, the latest Trend Research in Expectations in the New Decade study found that 45% of those between the ages of 25 and 49 perceived their personal economic situation to have been better in 1982 than it was five years ago. In 1981, 52% felt better about their personal economic status. Last year, 35% found their status to be worse, compared with 27% in that category in 1981.

But "expectations for the future have in general remained fairly constant over recent years. Currently, 63% anticipate improvement in their economic situation and only 14% expect deterioration," the study said.

Not surprisingly, long-term financial security was cited as the top economic priority in the study, with job security considered more important than higher salary.

Another finding related to financial security was a greater reluctance than was detected two years ago to be in debt or to take on long-term financial obligations. One exception to this was consideration of home purchases or plans for home renewal and repair. More middle-generation consumers either were considering buying a house, buying a larger house or moving to a better neighborhood in 1982 than in 1981.

Those surveyed also were concerned particularly with health and physical fitness because, the DDB study showed, those concerns assume greater significance in a "rough, competitive economy where jobs are seen as hard to get and hard to hold."

Despite financial worries, vacation plans have not suffered, however.

This was not the case where the study dealt with going out for general entertainment. "A home-prepared meal followed by a health food snack around the videogame is the contemporary—and even cliche—alternative to restaurant and movie," the DDB study found.

For marketers, the DDB study indicates further development of products and services that improve the home environment and provide an easy commingling of home and outside services, such as banking and electronic shopping from home. But businesses such as restaurants, movies, recreational products and amusement centers will have to work harder than ever to entice consumers with benefits that can't be found at home.

The preoccupation with fitness and health augurs well for products and services such as food processors, natural food companies, pharmaceutical companies, sporting goods marketers, new-cuisine restaurants, health clubs and weight control products/programs.

Stay-at-home preferences combined with time demands also could "propel interest in buy-at-home services."

Business has to contend with increased consumer demands that goods and services "justify price premiums on the basis of value delivered," said the DDB study, the third wave of a study that first was published in August-September, 1980.#

Foreign ad outlook

completely recession-proof. "We'll see the brunt of the recession falling on smaller, long-established agencies that occupy the middle ground," he says. "The 'gray' agencies, not the hot shops, may be suffering."

Doyle Dane Bernbach expects real billings growth of 10% to 15%, roughly the same as last year, but international billings are taking an increasing share—now 25%—of DDB's total business. One reason for optimism is the feeling that there will be fewer devaluations this year of the kind that wiped out dollar-denominated profits in Mexico, for example.

There is no single worldwide trouble spot that all agencies are worried about. For JWT, it is Asia (a strong spot for most other U.S. multinational shops), where billings are expected to increase only 8%. For the Interpublic Group, Europe is the problem area, particularly Great Britain, where its Wasey Campbell-Ewald and McCann-Erickson agencies are fading on the country's agency billings ranking.

Interpublic's chief executive officer, Phil Geier, expects the group's international billings to grow 10% this year, more than the expected growth in U.S. billings, but Europe is expected to lag behind at 9%. Mr. Geier anticipates 12% real growth in Asia and 10% in Latin America. "We expect a very tough first half this year internationally, but coming back to normal in the second half," he said.

In Europe, DDB's senior vp-international, Clay Timon, expects a dogfight. "It's no longer an expanding pie," he said. "It's a finite pie. We expect a struggle for market share with the other multinational agencies."

TBWA's chief executive officer, Bill Tragos, whose agency billings grew 25% in local currencies but only plus-or-minus 1% in dollars last year, expects a continuing slowdown for all agencies internationally. "The tough times of 1981-82 are a permanent condition," he says.

Despite the relative strength of international markets, agencies are playing it cautious. Grey Advertising, whose net income was battered last year, is holding down expenses by not replacing workers who leave and slowing down the rate of salary increases.

U.S. consumer advertisers generally are not cutting back, but some industrial advertisers are. Westinghouse Corp. is cutting its international ad budget for power generation, transmission and distribution equipment by an average 12% (25% in Latin America), with some of that redirected to sales support. "We think 1983 will be strong, but we're acting conservatively," said John Hartman, regional manager of communications. "We're trying to be at a good fighting weight."

At the local level, the consensus is that small or medium-size agencies outside the U.S. are going to bear the brunt of the recession.

In France, where real ad spending is expected to grow only 1% this year, the multinational agencies likely will gain the largest share of that business. "The big companies like Henkel and BSN/Gervais Danone are all keeping up their ad spend. . .Our projections are for an increase of 25% this year," said Pierre de Plas, head of Doyle Dane Bernbach S.A.

But the mood, even among big agencies, is gloomy in Germany, where a federal election in March, which could replace the new conservative government with the Social Democrats, has made the outlook for consumer markets unclear. As a result, many observers are betting there will be no ad spend growth this year.

Willi Schalk, exec vp of BBDO International, says: "For the first time since World War II economic growth, advertising included, will depend on the result of [the elections]. . .But even if the conservatives win, no real growth can be expected this year."

Big advertisers in Germany like Henkel are pushing major brands hard, particularly against generics. But some are also increasing their new-product launches. "In our established markets, private consumption can't be further increased so we are thinking seriously about moving into quite new markets," said Juergen Schrader, head of Unilever in Hamburg.

Defying the trend in Europe is Great Britain. The country's advertising association—representing both agencies and advertisers—boldly predicts that ad expenditures will increase 5% after inflation this year. Saatchi & Saatchi Compton Worldwide goes even further, predicting 7% to 8% real growth for the industry.

"Consumer spending is bottoming out after a stagnant year and is starting to rise again," says Ogilvy & Mather deputy chairman Mike Chapman. Also, imports are rising and the Conservative government's tax cut program is in the works, boosting consumer spending, observers say.

Only D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius disagrees, and is planning for no real growth in ad spending in Great Britain this year. Agency officials point to disappointing market shares racked up by the new Channel 4 as evidence that over-all ad growth will not materialize this year.

The biggest disaster looming is Mexico, formerly the second-largest consumer market in Latin America, where ad expenditures are expected to fall 30% this year. With the lifting of price controls, new taxes, roaring inflation and more devaluations expected, "this is the first year we have made three budgets. . .and we are unsure about each one," says Augusto Elias, president of Publicidad Augusto Elias. "We will be placing from 5% to 10% fewer ads."

Agencies are laying off even middle managers in preparation for further downturns, partly caused by new taxes on luxury items, medicines, plane fares abroad and imported wines.

But in Brazil, the region's largest ad market, ad expenditures are still expected to outpace inflation by at least 5%. However, the impact of still-unknown conditions that the International Monetary Fund places on the next loan to Brazil is causing advertisers to hold off spending in the first part of the year. "It will be initially tough until people are secure about what is happening financially," said JWT's president in Brazil, Lée Pavao. "But who knows what will happen when we get to the middle of the year?"

The Australian and Canadian markets also are expected to grow faster than inflation, but mainly in the second half. "Clients are hedging their bets. . .to protect themselves," said John Yocum, Y&R president in Canada. Weaker shops will either go bust or try to merge, says consultant Anthony Long, who knows of three medium-size shops already seeking mergers. In an ominous sign, the 300-store Toronto Eaton Center is cutting its ad budget by 25% this year, and rerunning last year's tv commercials.

A stronger yen compared with the dollar is expected to help multinationals in Japan, but "international marketers are showing a lot of caution," said a Dentsu-Young & Rubicam executive in Tokyo.

Japan, however, is expected to escape the brunt of the worldwide recession because multinational marketers "make their decisions based on local market conditions, and Japan has a healthy economy compared with most other countries," said Ted Motoyoshi, director and board member of Tokyu Advertising.#

ABC expands prime time ad slots

By DIANE MERMIGAS

ABC-TV will make an additional two minutes of network and one minute of local advertising available in prime time each week, beginning in April. It is the second phase of a commercial-time expansion launched by all three networks last fall.

Industry sources expect ABC's addition of four 30-second network spots weekly, which will come out of airtime normally devoted to network promotions and other nonprograming material, to yield an estimated $15 million annually.

A high-level CBS official, who learned of ABC's phase two plans from an ADVERTISING AGE inquiry, said the top-ranked network probably would follow suit, "because it couldn't afford not to match the competition." An NBC official said it would not be known for at least a month whether the third-place network would follow suit. NBC is reluctant to give up promotional time it needs to build its ratings.

The three networks last fall freed up seven 30-second network spots and two 30-second local spots weekly in prime time, which could render an estimated $25 million to $30 million in annual ad revenues for each, representing 2% to 3% of the networks' total ad take. Although an average prime time network spot is worth about $90,000, the revenue estimates are figured on a $70,000 per-spot basis to allow for the fluctuating price of prime time throughout the year.

ABC officials refused to elaborate on the second-phase expansion, saying they wanted first to discuss the matter with affiliated stations during ongoing regional meetings, which continue through this week.

Prime time commercial expansion has been a sensitive issue with many affiliates, who believe additional network ad sales take away dollars from spot buys. As a result of initial opposition, ABC, which led the other two networks in the initial commercial time expansion last fall, backed away from an original proposal to add seven minutes of additional weekly prime time ad time (one minute per night) and to give affiliates an additional four 30-second commercial breaks per week.

Instead, ABC adopted a three-phase plan which eventually may total up to more additional ad time than originally proposed. According to industry sources, ABC's announced second-phase expansion exceeds its original projected second-phase plan for three 30-second network spots and one 30-

Retirement tests faith of Bjorn-again

On Jan. 11, Bob Kain, business agent to Bjorn Borg, placed a call to John Stahler, president of Donnay USA, marketer of the tennis racquet Mr. Borg had used during his 10-year trip to the top of professional tennis.

Mr. Kain, who knew in early November that he would have to undertake this task, delivered a message that was short and painful. Mr. Borg, at the age of 26, would announce his retirement in early February. Mr. Kain also

Avon comes back in force, plans doubled ad budget

By PAT SLOAN

NEW YORK—Avon Products is trying to get its key Avon division, with its army of door-to-door sales representatives, back on track. To do so, the company plans to more than double the unit's media advertising expenditures and reinforce a field operations' program that was put in place last year.

The division's high profile in coming months will be in stark contrast to the past year and a half, when marketing funds, if not nonexistent, were not dispensed freely by the $2.6 billion company.

In 1982, about $7 million was spent on media advertising, according to James E. Preston, president of the Avon division and Avon Products' exec vp. This year, more than twice that amount will be spent for both print and tv institutional and product advertising, through Ogilvy & Mather.

Another $6 million or so will be given over for a recruitment campaign from N W Ayer, aimed at finding capable sales representatives for the 150,000 openings available, according to Avon.

All this activity comes when Wall Street has been noting the strong growth of competitor Mary Kay Cosmetics, which last month began its own tv campaign

Dailies catch more flak

By STUART EMMRICH

LAS VEGAS—Bled by the gaming tables and slot machines by night and berated by their advertisers by day, some of the approximately 800 people who attended last week's meeting of the International Newspaper Advertising & Marketing Executives might have left Las Vegas wondering why they had ever strayed from home.

Coming or going, they just couldn't win.

To be sure, there was some good news at the annual conference: The Newspaper Advertising Bureau predicted that ad spending in newspapers would increase 10% to $20.1 billion this year, led by dollar gains of 12% in national advertising, 10% in retail advertising and—finally—10% in classified advertising. Attendees also got a look at how newspapers around the country are effectively working with local retailers to promote their businesses, how they are successfully tapping co-op dollars and how they are making progress in the use of standardized national advertising.

But the message these execs got from advertisers on the program was similar to that delivered at last year's meeting—newspapers still aren't doing enough to satisfy the needs of their important customers.

Sonja Larson, vp-advertising of Target Stores, Minneapolis, started the dressing down by giving what she called an "I love you, but will you stop doing some things that bug me" talk. Target will place advertising in 100 papers this year, so Ms. Larson knew she had an attentive audience when she told the crowd that Target's biggest gripe was the paucity of standardized and understandable invoices used by newspapers.

Suspect fraud in FCB unit

By GAY JERVEY

Foote, Cone & Belding has begun an investigation into financial irregularities—"acts of fraudulence" as an FCB spokesperson put it—at Aitkin-Kynett, its Philadelphia-based subsidiary.

The inquiry by publicly held FCB revolves around a longtime Aitkin-Kynett financial executive who has been terminated.

Neither FCB nor Aitkin-Kynett would reveal the individual's identity. The FCB spokesperson stressed that charges have not yet been filed, nor has anyone been accused.

Aitkin-Kynett president John Newhall said the amount of money involved has not been determined and that client funds do not appear to be involved.

He added, "This appears to be an individual act. And there is no suggestion that clients will be in any way impacted."

Both Mr. Newhall and FCB also stressed that any losses to the agency would be minimal—$10,000 at the most—since the agency carries bonding insurance for such situations.

The bonding company would be liable for any amount over the $10,000 deductible.

FCB recently agreed to purchase another Philadelphia agency, Lewis & Gilman, to eventually be merged with Aitkin-Kynett (AA, Jan. 24).

Mr. Newhall, in noting that the investigation is still in progress, said he is satisfied that there does not appear to be any client money involved and that insurance will cover losses, so that this "unhappy situation" will not impact on the agency's results.#

Gov't units take sides in net syndication fight

By RICHARD L. GORDON

WASHINGTON—Reagan administration deregulators lined up with the tv networks and against advertisers, independent tv stations and Hollywood last week as the heat builds on the Federal Communications Commission to permit the nets to reenter domestic program syndication and co-production.

Network lobbyists, sifting through dozens of filings for and against FCC's financial interest and syndication rules, could count the Commerce and Justice Departments in their corner. But antinetwork groups scored a lobbying coup of their own when appeals to senior presidential aides reportedly led to a decision to pull back yet another endorsement of the network position, this one from the White House Office of Management & Budget.

That indication of direct White House interest in the tv programing dispute—plus the Justice Department's suggestion that totally "unrestricted" network involvement in syndication may be undesirable—adds another dimension to what one FCC insider says is the hottest battle over tv policy since lobbyists swarmed over Washington 10 years ago fighting for and against restrictions on cable tv.

"There's a whole lot of dough wrapped up in this," he said of the $800 million-plus U.S. program syndication market. "People will go all out."

More publicly, the antinetwork Committee for Prudent Deregulation at a press conference here warned that network reentry into U.S. syndication and co-production would be "an unmitigated disaster for

Bronco II utility vehicle also makes debut

Ford high on its restyled T-Bird

By RALPH GRAY

DETROIT—Ford division will spin marketing tales of the beauty and the beast this spring.

The beauty is the newly styled Thunderbird midsize specialty coupe, the first of Ford's new-look, aerodynamically styled cars. The beast is the Bronco II, a compact sports utility vehicle positioned against Chevrolet's S-10 Blazer.

Ford is hoping the T-Bird will revive the midspecialty market, which has plunged almost three points in market share from a year ago, to 7.2%. It goes against an aging array of General Motors specialties like Chevrolet Monte Carlo. The specialty cars have suffered from the various gas crunches and dated styling in a segment where styling counts heavily.

The latest T-Bird comes as a Turbo Coupe with a turbocharged, four-cylinder engine and enhanced performance and handling mechanicals. Division general manager Louis E. Lataif expects the turbo to "expand the traditional limits of the middle-specialty segment."

Certainly Thunderbird has done its bit over the years to expand things. Starting as a two-seater in the 1950s, the T-Bird went to four seats, grew larger with a droop nose, became a four-door, dropped back to an intermediate coupe almost indistinguishable from other Fords and, in 1982, rocked along as a kind of super Fairmont.

"We have done everything we could to abuse this car, but have been unable to destroy the name. We've moved the car around, but it's remained pretty popular and a very good name," said Douglas McClure, Ford ad manager.

■ Ad lines for the new T-Bird were moved around some, too. Last fall the idea was, "If we didn't dare make it different, we wouldn't have dared called it Thunderbird." That's been changed to, "Before we made it beautiful, we made it right." Those words are superimposed on profile, three-quarter and overhead shots of the car in a voiceless tv spot that broke on the Super Bowl telecast Jan. 30. Ford and J. Walter Thompson USA, Dearborn, Mich., find their tongues in other commercials being prepared.

The first ads emphasizing performance are for the regular V-6 T-Bird. The Turbo Coupe campaign comes in about six weeks, and will use phrases like "a worthy American touring car." Ads will use "long, long" technical copy, Mr. McClure said. Regular T-Bird

Oakland's daily hunts for savior

OAKLAND—Will the Oakland Tribune find a new owner or will it be the next big-city daily to go out of business?

That's the question Bay Area media watchers are asking, as editor and publisher Robert Maynard continues with what to date has been his unsuccessful efforts to find a group of local investors willing to band together to purchase the financially ailing newspaper from its current owner, Gannett. Repeated attempts to reach Mr. Maynard for comment were unsuccessful.

Rochester, N.Y.-based Gannett must unload the 108-year-old daily before it assumes the license of KRON-TV, San Francisco, because of restrictions on media cross-ownership (AA, Oct. 4).

Gannett chief financial officer Douglas McCorkindale admitted he senses Mr. Maynard is having problems putting the investor group together. "We are hoping Mr. Maynard will be able to buy it," he said, "but, if it appears he can't, we have others to talk to."

Who those others are, Mr. McCorkindale refuses to say, and others suggest that, at present, there are no serious bids for the paper, estimated to be losing $5

G. Giant leans toward lighter frozen foods

By JANET NEIMAN

Pillsbury Co.'s Green Giant is moving toward a lighter-foods positioning for its important frozen entree line, a move aimed at not only improving a lackluster line but slowing the market share surge of Stouffer Foods' low-calorie Lean Cuisine line. The action eventually will put the Minneapolis marketer in new product segments.

Already Green Giant has deemphasized "old, heavy traditional products" by eliminating several items and expanding its twin-pouch and lasagna lines. In addition, new products in development will be carefully monitored for calorie and sodium content.

Unlike Stouffer, Pillsbury will use its existing product line to develop the "light foods" positioning, and "will not go directly against the caloric claim" in its advertising, according to George McCarthy, vp and business manager for frozen entrees. Mr. McCarthy would not comment on plans for the line beyond midyear, when the company will break a revamped advertising campaign that "expands" its current campaign.

Green Giant frozen entrees now rank seventh in the $1.5 billion frozen entree market—the same place they held last year—behind Stouffer, Banquet, Swanson, Weight Watchers, Tyson and Weaver (the latter two mainly frozen chicken marketers), and have shown only a slight decline from last year's 4.3% share. But the line's stagnation has come at the same time Stouffer has increased its dollar market share 36%, and the category as a whole has grown 25%.

"We're not trying to make Green Giant something it isn't," Mr. McCarthy said, but "within our regular line, we have the wherewithal to compete with low-calorie products." The company sees itself, he said, as a purveyor of NBC's Quincy, a.k.a. Jack Klugman, is simultaneously pitching personal copiers for the Japanese and nonaspirin St. Joseph's for adults. As spokesman for Canon U.S.A.'s PC-20 and PC-10, Mr. Klugman is appearing in a $15 million print and tv campaign via Y&R/Dentsu. For St. Joseph's, he is acting very Quincy-like in new tv commercials that are part of the $20 million Schering-Plough push into the adult pain reliever fray (AA, Nov. 29), via Warwick Advertising. The busy Mr. Klugman is also appearing in new spots for Gagliardi Bros.' Steak-Umm sandwich steaks. (See photo, Page 22.)

Industry looking to raise $40 million

Major nuclear blitz on line

WASHINGTON—The Committee for Energy Awareness, organized by the nuclear power industry, is trying to raise $40 million for a mid-1983 media blitz to reshape public opinion about radiation and radioactive waste.

Meanwhile, it's preparing an agency review and is testing tv and radio spots via a Los Angeles issue advertising specialist, Winner/Wagner & Associates.

While Winner/Wagner is first in the door, and has connections to the nuclear industry dating to 1976, a committee official said dozens of other agencies have been contacted, and several are expected to be invited to make presentations. The agencies were not identified.

Campaign strategy being presented to potential funders calls for the purchase of about $25 million in tv, radio and print advertising, and about $15 million is earmarked for expanded media relations, "coalition building," research papers, and opinion research, according to Patrick Wheeler, projects manager for the committee. He declined comment on how much of the budget already has been raised.

The test campaign, which has aired over the past several months, involved two different approaches. One set of commercials features a medical doctor employed by the Electric Power Research Institute talking about nuclear safety programs, Mr. Wheeler said. The other set details the need for nuclear energy's role in assuring a thriving America. All the commercials carry the theme line, "To set the record straight."

The tests involved large media buys, usually as much as 650 rating points a week. Grand Rapids, Mich., was chosen for its "typical town" demographic profile.

In Chicago, Phoenix and Spartanburg/Greenville, S.C., on the other hand, nuclear energy is especially controversial. Chicago's Commonwealth Edison is the largest user of nuclear power plants in the country; Phoenix's Palo Verde nuclear power plant is scheduled to come on line next year and the federal government has been testing nuclear waste disposal in Arizona, and Spartanburg/Greenville has nuclear power plants, a nuclear waste facility and a reprocessing plant nearby.

Final selection of an agency to handle this year's campaign tentatively is slated for April, Mr. Wheeler said. Winner/Wagner & Associates, originally a political campaign management company, first came to the nuclear industry's attention when it helped turn back a 1976 California state referendum against nuclear power plants.

The Committee for Energy Awareness was formed in June, 1979, to spread the nuclear power industry's response to the Three Mile Island disaster, and many members also belong to the Edison Electric Institute or Atomic Industrial Forum, industry groups representing investor-owned electric companies or companies that design, build and equip nuclear plants. Both have conducted their nuclear ad efforts.

While the committee is secretive about who its 68 corporate members are, it announced that Harold B. Finger, former head of General Electric's power systems division, recently was named president by a managing board consisting of executives of Bechtel Power Group, Westinghouse, Rocky Mountain Energy Co. (the uranium mining subsidiary of Union Pacific), Aluminum Corp. of America (Alcoa), Commonwealth Edison, Pacific Gas & Electric, Houston Lighting & Power, Middle South Utilities, Georgia Power Co., Texas Utilities Co., Carolina Power & Light, Consumers Power Co., Arizona Public Service Co. and the Salt River Project (a Phoenix utility).#

DUESSELDORF—BBDO/Telecom is the name of a new fully owned subsidiary of Team/BBDO here, founded for "the exploitation of new communications media." In a similar move, Troost Campbell-Ewald, also in Duesseldorf, announced last week that it had split its operation into three divisions, one of which is called New Media (the others are Marketing Communications and Social and Institutional Communications).

LONDON—Beecham Inc. has paid $70 million for Schering-Plough's do-it-yourself products subsidiary Dap, following its purchase four months ago of the J.B. Williams Co. consumer products group. The two acquisitions bring Beecham's annual sales in the U.S. to $500 million.

PARIS—Gaumont Pictures, the No. 1 French film group that also owns Le Point, has bought a 10% share in the leading French agency, Publicis. Their first joint venture will be a chain of video stores.

FRANKFURT—Kentucky Fried Chicken is trying for a German comeback and will enter the Cologne market in February. The Heublein-owned operation had dwindled to a few franchise outlets near U.S. military bases. Agency is Young & Rubicam.

NEW YORK—Grey Advertising chairman Ed Meyer expects by year's end to have a new affiliation in Malaysia, Taiwan or the Philippines. Meanwhile, billings in Grey's London office were boosted to more than $64 million last week, with the acquisition of Canadian word processor company AES ($2.1-million) and Intercontinental Hotels ($1.2 million).

Home electronics zoom to new highs in ad awareness

By JOSEPH M. WINSKI

adWatch

With its heavy pre-Christmas advertising, Atari was December's biggest gainer in ad awareness. Whether or not that translated to retail sales for the Warner Communications videogame/home computer subsidiary is another matter, but its awareness in the home electronics category jumped 6.6 points to 26.2% in the monthly adWatch survey. That is its best score to date; Atari has led the category every month.

Atari also leaped to No. 2, behind Coca-Cola, in top-of-mind awareness of all advertising (not limited to a particular category). Atari had not made the top 10 in over-all awareness previously.

Apple Computer made its first appearance in the home electronics category's top three, finishing second with 4.2%

Can Grey shake Church's awake?

By TOM BAYER

Ad agencies come and ad agencies go, but for Church's Fried Chicken, the nation's second-largest fried chicken fast-food chain, the coming and going of agencies has become a way of life.

With the San Antonio-based chain's latest such selection, Grey Advertising's Los Angeles office became the sixth agency in 10 years to try to tackle the Church's challenge. So far, no agency has succeeded in shaking solid marketing sense into Church's noggin.

The more than 1,330-unit chain has managed to develop an enviable financial reputation and has attracted many an analyst's buy recommendation. Until fiscal year 1982, Church's recorded 14 straight years of earnings gains for a compound 10-year growth rate of 29%.

But Church's reputation as a marketer has worsened steadily as one agency after another has been dismissed for failing to achieve the return on investment demanded. Church's hadn't been a believer in national advertising before Kentucky Fried Chicken came along with its big-bucks campaigns 10 years ago. And some agency executives feel that Church's still doesn't believe in advertising, though it announced a $7 million budget in 1982 (which it did not spend) and a $9 million budget for 1983.

Says Reginald Lynch, Church's national marketing director, "We do a good job financially. We do a good job on operations. The miss-of the responses. Mattel's Intellivision (3.5% of December responses) and Tandy Corp.'s Radio Shack (2.9%) also seemed to be heavy December advertisers, but both showed insignificant awareness gains for the month and actually dropped in the rankings, Radio Shack to No. 4 from No. 3 and Intellivision to No. 3 from No. 2.

Polaroid—another gift item—continued its surge, begun in October, with a significant 6.1 point awareness gain in December, to 16.6%—its best score yet. Kodak remained No. 1 in cameras, with 25%, up from 23.9% in November. No. 3 Canon posted a significant 3.6 point rise to 11.3%.

The adWatch survey also showed that consumer awareness of Tylenol advertising appears to be stronger than ever. Among consumers questioned in December, 31.2% said Tylenol advertising was the first that came to mind of all medicine and drug advertising. That was Tylenol's best adWatch score yet and a statistically significant increase of 5.5 percentage points from November's 25.7%.

AdWatch, a joint project of ADVERTISING AGE and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb., has been measuring ad awareness monthly since last April. AdWatch telephone interviewers ask a national sample of consumers—1,252 in December—to name the first advertising that comes to mind of all they have seen or heard in the previous 30 days in each of 20 product categories. The December survey was conducted from Dec. 1 through Dec. 20.

Tylenol has led in the medicine and drugs category in every month, but its 5.3-to-1 December margin over runner-up Anacin, whose advertising was named by 5.8% of the respondents, was its widest yet. Tylenol's December awareness seemed to be helped substantially by a massive newspaper coupon offer launched on Nov. 21 by Johnson & Johnson. Of the respondents in December who said Tylenol advertising first came to mind, 23% identified newspapers as the source of the ad, compared to 13% in November.

In the closely watched fast-food category, McDonald's in December continued to regain some of the ground lost to Burger King and the controversial comparative ads it broke in September. McDonald's ads were mentioned as those first coming to mind by 38.5% of the respondents last month, up from 36.5% in December and double the 19.3% who named Burger King (versus 20.5% in November).

There were some newcomers to the top three in several other categories as well. In airlines, Delta—presumably by beginning to promote its routes to sunny vacation spots—broke the Eastern/United/-American hold on the group. It finished third with a score of 10.4%—up a significant 3.5 points. American fell out of the top three for the first time. Eastern suffered a 3.5 point drop in awareness to 11.6% and fell from No. 1 to No. 2. United regained the top spot with 12.2% of mentions.

In beer, Michelob became the first beer other than Miller, Budweiser and Coors to make the top three. Michelob tied for No. 3 with Coors, with 5.6% of the category's responses. Michelob broke a new tv campaign featuring dramatic music, closeups of the beer being poured and just the words, "Some things speak for themselves."

Miller remained No. 1 in the category, but halted its three-month string of progressively wider margins over No. 2 Budweiser. Bud narrowed the gap to 2.7 points with a score of 13%, up from 11.8% in November, while Miller was receiving 15.7% of the responses, down from 18.4% in November.

Chanel's provocative "share the fantasy" tv spots apparently captured the fantasy of a lot of consumers in December: Chanel advertising shot from unranked among the top five to No. 1 in cosmetics and fragrances, with 5.3% of the category responses, up 3.2 points and more than double November's score of 2.1%.

Coca-Cola regained the top spot in soft drinks for the first time since August with 26% of the responses, up 4.2 points, while Pepsi-Cola fell to No. 2 with 24.9%, down from 25.8%. 7UP was No. 3, but received 9.1% of the responses, up from 6.4% and its best score yet.#

Becker moving full steam ahead at Bates

By FRED DANZIG

NEW YORK—To Adam, his 10-year-old son, Mike Becker's new job means he has an office on the 27th floor of a building, 1515 Broadway, that gives him a full-time view of the aircraft carrier Intrepid at anchor at a North River pier.

To the 42-year-old Mike Becker, newly installed creative leader at Ted Bates Advertising after a 15-year career at Young & Rubicam, that dramatic view is only one part of a career move that has him floating on an emotional high. As he tells it, he's not on the 27th floor; he's on cloud nine and "my feet haven't touched the carpet yet."

Besides the euphoria and the dramatic view west to New Jersey, where the Becker family lives, there are the official titles of exec vp, Ted Bates Worldwide, and vice-chairman/chief creative officer of Bates' New York office. He brought with him from Y&R only one possession, his Royal typewriter ("I really cut the cord"), but he left behind what he considers his legacy, the many creatives he hired over the years, and especially the 14 who have moved up to become associate creative directors.

"They talk about my writing talents," Mr. Becker said, "but really, the legacy is the people. If you really surround yourself with good people, you come out way ahead. That way, when you leave, you know the good work will go on." At Y&R, within hours after Mr. Becker announced that he was moving to Bates, a Becker protege, Louis DiJoseph, was named to succeed him.

"Some of my young people said, how dare I do that, pick up and leave? I tell them, look, what I'm against in this business is where you work for two or three years at an agency, do a few pool-out commercials and then move on to another agency for quick money, just for a few thousand bucks more. This isn't like that. I put in 15 years at Y&R. My friends there—Ed Ney, Jay McNamara, Alex Kroll and others—were singular about how they respected my decision. So I leave with my head up high. I told them all to keep up their good work so that I can continue to be proud of them. And I hope they can be continue to be proud of me."

Mr. Becker sees his role as one that must inspire and motivate people. "We have a tremendous amount of talent over here. Some are people I had at Y&R, writers, producers, art directors. So I know a lot of them before I start. And I know that if you motivate them, they'll walk through walls for you. In fact, I have applicants who know I've said that and they write and say, 'Hire me and I'll walk through walls for you.' "

Asked about the Unique Selling Proposition for which Bates' creative is famous, and about the Y&R approach, perceived as one that brings more emotion to the ad, Mr. Becker wasn't buying the perception. "Look, both agencies are dedicated to top commercial persuasion. They do it very well. Both are old agencies, Bates is 42 and Y&R 57, and both work for large, important package goods clients. There are remarkable similarities between them. They do good creative work. They have a heritage. I did a tremendous amount of research on Bates before I went to work here, and I know I've left one good agency for another. USP is something that works; it's working. And I guess what I have is USF—Unique Selling Feeling. Bob Jacoby [Bates chairman] and I have a nice rhythm. We're quite fond of each other. Maybe I'll add a little USF to the USP, and maybe I can just move the mountain a few inches. Things are going well here at Bates; this isn't a radical change. I intend to nurture the talent that's here and keep success moving along."

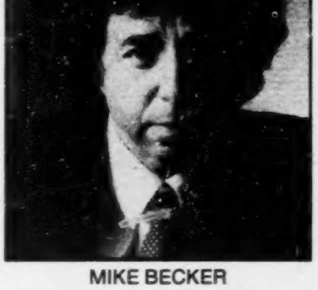
While he looks as though he would have been cast perfectly as another of those bushy-haired creatives from Brooklyn, Mike Becker is from Ohio—Toledo, to be exact—the son of a college professor. Brothers also are college professors and, to keep the family tradition whole, Mike Becker himself has been teaching a copywriting course for the past eight years at Pratt University. Now a full professor at Pratt, he has taken a leave of absence so he can attend to his new duties.

At Syracuse University's School of Dramatic Arts, he thought he would become an actor. But after comparing his talents with those of classmate Frank Langella, he realized that he would never be successful as an actor, so he switched to an English major. After college, he found himself in a Catch-22 as he sought to break into the agency business: He couldn't get himself hired because he lacked a portfolio and he couldn't put a portfolio together because he had no job. He did the next best thing, enlisted in the Army and, from 1963-65, drove a tank around Fort Knox, Ky.

After the service, he returned to New Jersey and talked himself into a job as the helicopter traffic reporter for WJRZ Radio. Alex Kroll, now Y&R president, was a WJRZ sportscaster at the time. Mr. Becker says the three years' worth of six-hour days in a helicopter helped prepare him for the agency career ahead. "The helicopter job was so stressful that everything that came after that has been easy for me. That's why I'm a Pollyanna about this business. I can take everything in stride now."

There still remained the task of breaking into advertising. As it happened, Mike Becker had a neighbor, Bill Casey, then one of the star copywriters at Papert, Koenig, Lois, and also the teacher of Bill Casey's Copy Course. Mr. Casey took Mr. Becker under his wing and, as a good neighbor, on his own time, spoon-fed his writing course to his eager neighbor. There soon came a junior writer job for Mr. Becker at PKL, where he wrote on Xerox and National Airlines. "I learned a lot," he says, "by working two days a day."

In 1968, Y&R beckoned and Mr. Becker made the move. He worked with Steve Frankfurt, Tony Isidore and Al Hampel, among others, became a stockholder in 1970, associate creative director in 1972, senior vp in '74 and in '75, when his former WJRZ colleague, Mr. Kroll, promoted Frazier Purdy (now exec vp-creative director), Mr. Becker replaced Mr. Purdy as copy chief. "Those three years, '75 to '78, were my favorite years at Y&R," he recalled. "I didn't know anything about interviewing, or administration, but I was allowed to scour the country, meet the writers of America, interview them and hire the best of them whenever I could."



MIKE BECKER

At Y&R, Mr. Becker supervised the work of about 80 creative people as a group creative director. At Bates, he will work with more than 100, but the scope of his new duties doesn't faze him a bit. Having put in three years as a helicopter traffic reporter around the George Washington Bridge, Mr. Becker has shown that he's ready for anything.

What makes it all the sweeter is that view of the Intrepid.#

A ‘yes . . . but’ kind of year

Ad and agency executives aren’t expecting miracles

By Herbert Zeltner

Sounding Board

Looking back on it, 1982 was quite a year for American advertisers and their agencies. There was a recession in some quarters that just wouldn’t quit, but there were also burgeoning sales and record profits, at least in some sectors. There were budget increases and budget slashing. There were shifts from traditional advertising media into (presumably) faster-action promotions, many of them emphasizing “price-off” deals and rebates. There was a noticeable emphasis on low-price themes at the same time as more image ads and even blatant luxury appeals to the “carriage trade.” Higher charges to upfront buyers and a marked softening in newspaper and magazine advertising volume and dollar revenue accompanied considerable network tv audience erosion. And there were some very real question marks about how fast cable ad revenue was growing.

As 1983 gets under way, it, too, looks like an enigma, beset by troublesome crosscurrents and contradictory signals for just about all marketers and advertising people. It’s a year that starts with equivocal readings on consumer confidence and spending habits, uncertainty about interest rates and the direction of the economy in general, rapid expansion by some retailers and major retrenchments scheduled by others, booming growth in personal computers but a startlingly rapid softening in electronic game sales, more rebates and coupons for some and vows to “swear off” by others and an abrupt slowing down in cable tv development even as some major new print media offerings, such as Time Inc.’s TV-Cable Week and Gannett Co.’s USA Today, start up and expand.

Are there any patterns that give some meaning to this patchwork of upbeat, downbeat and sideways movement? Are there longer-term trends at work in marketing strategy and ad activity as the econony seems to adjust to new forces and unprecedented conditions?

Several weeks ago we polled members of the ADVERTISING AGE Editorial Sounding Board for their experiences during the past year and their views on the near-term future. More than 160 top executives from a broad range of clients and agencies responded. They told us what happened to their budgets, strategies and ad practices in 1982 and how they are coping with the challenge of an uncertain, yet intriguingly promising, 1983.

Poor business conditions did hit in many advertising sectors, a bit later than consumer sales might have suggested. But they finally resulted in some sizable budget cutbacks, elimination of marginal brands, much greater emphasis on promotion at the expense of advertising and considerably more localization of marketing efforts in an attempt to improve targeting against better areas of opportunity.

Robert Varian, Jeffrey Martin Inc.: Setting the stage for newly acquired brands.

It doesn’t look as if 1983 will be much of a watershed year for marketing and advertising in general. Many of the hard-nosed practices and more conservative approaches adopted in response to tight business conditions are already in place, according to our panelists. Thus, the new year is likely to be one of continuing attempts at rigorous market segmentation; last-minute release of advertising funds; a drive to attain maximum impact for each dollar spent, and a pragmatic focus on proven promotion techniques.

None of these is a radical departure, major investment or lavish testing of new approaches.

Agencies are considerably happier with 1982 results, than their clients and also are much more bullish about the near-term outlook. Many of the agency managers on our panel pointed out that they can overcome the setbacks of client retrenchment in weak, mature sectors by aggressively pursuing new business.

Quite a few members of the board see 1983 as a period of solid, dependable and sustained recovery, both for American business in general, and for their own companies and agencies as well. Many expect to spend and promote aggressively throughout the year to take advantage of what they perceive as the early stages of what promises to be tremendous new opportunity for the longer term.

Thus, like the year past, 1983 shapes up as a “yes, but . . .” kind of situation. Yes, business has been rough and we’ve had to cut back, postpone, cancel and sometimes pull our punches. But, judging from our panel’s answers to the 10 questions we asked, there are still plenty of new markets, consumer money, potential volume and profits out there—provided the contenders work hard and go after it intelligently, realistically and aggressively.

1. For 1982, how did your own advertising budgets fare compared with plans at the start of the year? (For agencies, how did billings and revenue hold up?)

For both advertisers and agencies, budgets held up remarkably well throughout 1982. More than half the entire panel, 56%, reported that ad budgets and agency billings increased by 59% or more from preliminary estimates as the year played out. In fact, fully three out of 10 pointed to increases of 15% or more, well ahead of 1982’s dropping inflation rate.

Herb Baum, Campbell Soup Co.: Stronger building and rebuilding of brand franchises.

But the agencies experienced a much stronger year than did their clients. Thirty-seven per cent of agency managers reported that they were ending 1982 with billings and revenue “considerably higher” than expected at the outset. Only 17% of the advertisers reported that they were in this same happy position.

On the downside, fewer than one in five panel members (18%) reported any budget or billing decreases at all from their initial plans—only 11% from agencies, but a notable 29% among advertisers.

Agency management pointed to two key reasons for the discrepancy. First, they were able to take advantage of the traditional phenomenon that most consumer nondurables, package goods, proprietaries and personal care items hold up in bad and good times. And these same categories tend to be advertising intensive, providing the larger brand budgets on which so many agencies depend.

Robert Varian, vp of marketing and advertising at Jeffrey Martin Inc., which markets Compoz, Ayds, Doan’s Pills and other brands, points out that 1982 saw major budget increases occasioned by a restaging of brands acquired in 1981. He says sales response has been excellent and media expenditures will be increased in 1983.

Herb Baum, vp of marketing at Campbell Soup Co., notes that his company is building and rebuilding brand franchises with strong consumer marketing programs, besides having launched three major new products in 1982.

The chairman of a major pharmaceutical products agency says economic problems didn’t affect his clients to any great degree and, thus, his organization was obtained noticeable new business.

Morgan Hunter, president of MCA Advertising, underscores the point: “We’ve had a good year. . . . Much of this came from new products we’ve helped our clients develop. Since we specialize in consumer package goods, we have not been hurt by the economy.”

A second element contributing to the agencies’ more bullish response is the growing realization reported by many clients that recessionary periods offer a unique opportunity to make headway when others pull back—provided those clients are able and willing to keep up the pressure.

Stanley Pearlman, president of AMS Advertising, a New York agency, says that because some of his major clients are “underdogs,” they’ve been gaining market share from larger competitors and are, therefore, in an upswing.

Morgan Hunter, MCA Advertising: “We’ve had a good year. We have not been hurt by the economy.”

From the client side, confirmation comes from Reid Taube of U.S. Fidelity & Guarantee Corp.: “Our budget in 1982 was up significantly, while most of our competition saw budgets flat or reduced. Since our awareness and favorable attitude levels gained considerably, this was a classic case of really making headway by raising budgets when competition does the opposite.”

There are advantages to working deliberately against the tide, according to Michael Kirby, director of corporate advertising and promotion, Xerox Corp. “The office equipment category remains intensely competitive and a significant reduction in advertising expenditures would result in erosion,” he says. “Our tracking studies indicate a close correlation between share of voice and share of market.”

But all is not upbeat by any means at the agencies. Many have suffered in 1982 or, at best, have held their own in a very difficult environment. William Biggs of Biggs/Gilmore Associates, Kalamazoo, Mich., says: “Ten of our industrial accounts have been hit very hard by the recession. But consumer accounts have been up.”

Agencies are keeping a sharp lookout for possible improved operating efficiency while they struggle with cash flow. Earl Littman, chairman of Goodwin, Dannenbaum, Littman & Wingfield, Houston, points to a good year in revenues but notes that “profits are down. Slow pay and cutbacks are hurting. We’ve cut expenses considerably but not enough to keep our net profit margin.”

2. Still looking at the past year, have your own (or your clients’) marketing and advertising techniques undergone any significant changes?

Aside from fairly widespread changes in budgets, both up and down, the most frequently mentioned alteration in marketing activity last year is the shift of dollars from media advertising to promotion. Forty per cent of the entire panel point to this change in emphasis, almost all saying their companies or clients took more funds from traditional media—broadcast and print—and used it for rebates, trade incentives, couponing or other forms of merchandising that promise a fast impact on share, volume and, they hoped, the bottom line.

Marketing executives responsible for major entries among food brands, beer, airlines, fast-food franchises, tires and alcoholic beverages all point to reductions in media efforts to pay for contests, discounts, sweepstakes and all the many other promotion forms designed to jolt retail movement—and fast.

James Kobs, president of Kobs & Brady, a Chicago-based direct mail specialist, says, “Strategies are shifting to things that are more bottom-line oriented, like sales promotion and direct marketing.”

Al Ries, chairman of Trout & Ries, New York, echoes the thought: “The emphasis has changed from long-term strategic programs to short-terms tactical ones. Media changes reflect a desire for instant sales.”

Closely related to this phenomenon—and pointed out as another significant shift in strategy during 1982 by 30% of the Sounding Board—are alterations in media emphasis, both in form and scheduling, all of them intended to sharpen up the presumed dollar efficiency and effectiveness of ad dollars.

network tv to lower-cost daytime segments. Another marketing executive, this one for consumer leisure products, says his company shifted from magazines to newspapers for better territory targeting and reduced costs.

In the same vein, Richard Pike, director of advertising services at Hunt-Wesson Foods, points out that his company is more concerned about the continuing fragmentation of network tv audiences, and significantly increased costs "have led to a heavier investment in consumer magazines."

Quite a few other panel members say their media planning involved move. toward very careful selection of key media forms, such as fewer stations in a market, shorter lists of magazines and tightening up wherever possible.

One undeniable result of these moves is a continuation of the general trend toward greater use of local media forms at the expense of national ones. In the words of one panelist: "Advertising weight is being targeted to where the customer is. We see much less use of national advertising, more use of local and regional forms."

3. Turning now to the new year, how do you see over-all business conditions and the state of the consumer economy in 1983?

Eighty-three per cent of the respondents see either a weak or spotty recovery, but a recovery nonetheless. This view is held both by advertisers and agency management, although the client side tends toward "weak" as their adjective for this recovery. "Spotty" or "varied" characterizes the agencies' somewhat wider view of the economy.

Fundamental problems of lingering unemployment, shaken consumer confidence and continuing difficulties in "smokestack" America color the caution of many members in their over-all view. But areas of strength do show up in electronics, soft drinks and beer, luxury goods, new investment and banking opportunities, and that should be reflected in advertising activity in those areas.

These executives also point to deferred capital improvements and sparse inventories that need replenishing as reasons business in general and advertising in particular will pick up as 1983 progresses.

But circumstances have been so unusual in recent months that many members of the board hedge their guesses. One major Midwest agency head says, "We've never been more uncertain about what our agency's gross income will be for 1983 than right now." Larry Spector, chief executive officer of Calet, Hirsch, Kurnit & Spector, simply says, "I wish I knew."

As edgy as many of these executives are, there is still a distinct feeling that things have bottomed out, that 1983 will see a gradual return to better conditions. Norman Campbell, chairman of Tracy-Locke/BBDO, Dallas, says "We're looking for stronger signs of recovery in some of the heavier industries—autos, steel, energy. Services, electronics, data transmission and high technology businesses should be highly competitive but strong. Residential construction should improve, especially in the Southwest and West. Financial services should also be intensely competitive."

Earl Littman, Goodwin, Dannenbaum, Littman & Wingfield: Profits are down.

4. Will your own company or agency reflect this general outlook or be different in some way?

A bare majority of the panel believes that their organizations will mirror their view of general business conditions in 1983. In fact, a sizable minority, 38%, are somewhat more bullish, with agencies, once again, even more so. Fully 47% on this side thinks things will be better for them than for the economy as a whole.

The ad director of a top automotive importer sees a particularly strong year ahead for his company because of consumer perceptions of better quality in his entry. The vp and general manager of a top manufacturer of convenience foods sees his basic branded line stronger than ever, while more discretionary categories may have some continuing difficulty. Other client executives point to the major tightening they went through in 1982 as improving their chances for sales and profits this year.

On the agency side, while quite a few still see some stringent operating concerns, many are quite optimistic that 1983 will be a good year for them in billings, revenue and profits.

Quite a few heads of large, medium and small agencies across the country note their strong emphasis on new business activity as their best bet for continued growth and progress. Earl Littman of Houston says: "We'll continue to aggressively attack new business. Any losses in 1982 have been overcome with the addition of new clients."

James Scott of J. I. Scott Co., Grand Rapids, Mich., echoes the thought: "Reduced budgets are forcing advertisers to get more 'bang for their buck'; there are plenty of new business opportunities."

James Doyle, president of D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius, Bloomfield Hills, Mich., offers a good insight into how agencies are adjusting to new possibilities and changing client requirements: "We've been diversifying both in types of accounts served and in a broadened array of services offered. We're much more able to do the whole job for our clients then ever before, from market planning to sales to training, etc."

But even with this sense of buoyancy and aggressiveness, there's continuing concern about economic weakness, the traditional view of advertising as a lagging economic indicator and the uncertainties of a far-from-cloudless business horizon.

5. Has your company (your agency's clients) changed its planning time frame and media commitment practices?

One of the most direct bits of evidence of uncertainty in the ad business is the shortening of planning periods or delays in committing media funds. Fully 56% of the Sounding Board's members indicate they have adjusted or are moving in this direction now as a reaction to the unsettled conditions of the past year or so. The phenomenon seems even more prevalent from the agency side, 67%, than from client indications, 35%.

James Kobs, Kobs & Brady: Shifting to sales promotion and direct marketing.

If this trend holds true for the ad business as a whole, it has truly major implications for the ways by which media are bought and sold in just about all categories. This need for short-term flexibility could well reshape the business of scheduling and deadlines.

Several dozen panelists, both advertisers and agencies, say that although they still work through annual plans for strategy purposes, they now go through semiannual, quarterly or even monthly reviews to make sure the very latest sales and financial results and competitive actions are considered when advertising funds are released.

One large-volume liquor importer notes that his organization now requires much greater flexibility in ad plans, and firm commitments for the second half of 1983 are not expected until the last moment. David McNertney, vp of advertising, State Farm Insurance, also sees a change in planning, at least "to some extent." "We have looked more carefully for 'markets of opportunity' and committed some extra dollars in those places," he says.

The current planning cycle seems to have run quite a bit later this past season, and many panelists, especially in agencies, note that they're now behind schedule in blocking out campaigns and implementing schedules. But the need for a longer time frame in fiscal planning and general strategy still seems to apply. Saul Waring, president of Waring & LaRosa, sums up the view of many: "Planning hasn't changed, but commitment of funds has changed. Large companies have planning cycles and maintain them. More companies are trying to avoid being boxed in by long-term commitments. The 1982 experience is making marketers more cautious about having options and turnaround time."

6. For 1983, as compared with 1982, what changes do you anticipate in your advertising and promotion budgets (for agencies, billings and fees)? For what particular reasons?

Looking at dollars now for the year ahead instead of assessing performance for the year past, the panel continues to be remarkably bullish regarding the amounts allocated to marketing and advertising and, thus, to expectations for agency revenue as well. Fully 80% of the board sees some budget and billings increase for their own organizations in 1983. An impressive 37% sees this gain as "considerable"—up by more than 15%. The comparable figures for 1982 were quite a bit lower—56% and 30% respectively.

Despite the large amount of uncertainty and anxiety evident in many comments elsewhere in our poll, there's little doubt that the great majority of the board members expect considerably more money to be spent for advertising this year. Furthermore, as was true for 1982, the agency segment is noticeably more optimistic. Half of all agency managers expect their gross revenues (billings and fees) to increase by 15% or more in 1983, on top of the 37% having seen this rate of gain in the past year.

Only one in 20 Sounding Board members expects a setback in funds, with only 2% of the agencies predict-

Cable menu: A tv gourmet's delight—or is it?

By Gerard McTigue

I recently subscribed to cable television. I was like a child. The first night I rushed home to begin enjoying the whole new world of entertainment that cable opened up. Now I could watch uncut—ooh la la!—commercial-free movies. Nonstop news. Sports everlasting.

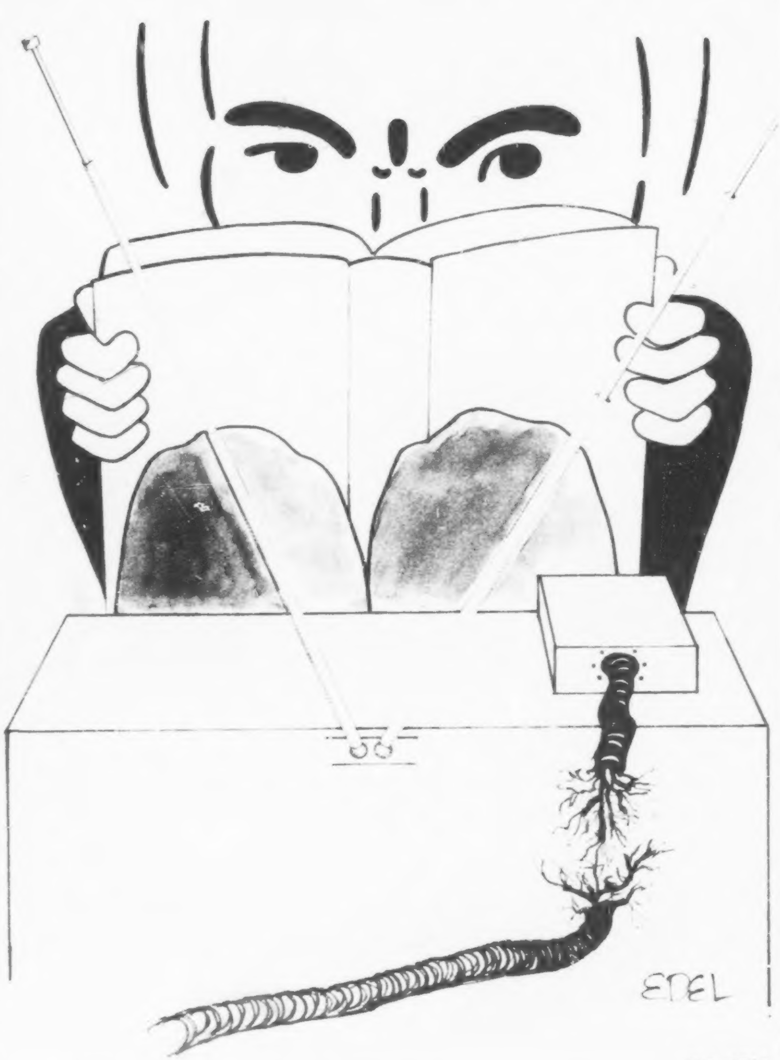
There were channels to uplift me culturally, and others to debauch me with erotica. If I liked finance, I could (excuse the expression) pig out on finance. The same with health. Music. In fact, there were no fewer than 63 channels to regale me—a visual smorgasbord that would satisfy even the most finicky tv appetite.

So what would I watch tonight? A simple enough matter. I grabbed the movie channel program, the local cable guide and, just to make sure I wasn't missing anything on those jaded old networks, the evening newspaper. It was 6:46.

As I pored over the listings I began to hyperventilate. Was this a night for tv! There was a major Academy Award winning movie. A stellar production of "La Boheme." A big basketball game. An exclusive interview with my favorite author. Another great movie. A star-studded rock concert. A Eugene O'Neill play. A blue nightclub act. A documentary on UFOs. And on, and on. I smacked my lips and laughed dementedly.

By the time I had finished just reading about what was on, it was 7:13. Damn! I missed the start of the movie. And there's nothing I hate more than coming in on a movie in progress. But wait. The film would be cablecast again at 3 a.m. Wednesday. I checked my calendar. Terrific. I would be free.

But what about now? What was I going to watch now? I was getting grumpy. I hadn't eaten anything, and I don't like making decisions on an empty stomach.



Richard Edel

Besides, supper was on the table. First I would eat. (I hate eating in front of the tv; it's not only antisocial, I don't like picking crumbs out of my shag carpet.)

The meal consumed, sated, I checked my watch—7:57. Perfect. Just in time for "La Boheme." I trundled over to the tv set for my just desserts.

Wait a second, I thought. If I watch "La Boheme" at eight, I'll miss that exclusive interview at nine. Better I watch the first half of the basketball game, switch over to the interview, catch the end of the game, then put on the O'Neill play at 10. Not a bad lineup at all. I froze. What if the game goes into overtime? That would throw a wrench into everything. Let's take it from the top. So I worked out another delectable menu built around the second highly rated film. 8:07. Damn! The movie had already begun.

I threw the paper down in disgust. I decided I would just turn on the set, and whatever station was on, whatever they were showing, I would watch it.

I turned on the set. There was this woman in leotards rolled up in a ball, telling me to breathe in and exhale slowly. I flicked the dial. A live caller was telling a video psychic what he could do with his show. I flicked again. The first movie, in progress, forget it. Click. Swish! Click. ". . . remember to make sure the butter is fully melted before adding the filberts." Click.

It went on like that for 15 minutes. I sat there, my nose not more than 10 in. from the screen, impatiently changing channels every few seconds, unable to stick with anything, unwilling to miss anything. A dazzling video mosaic of lush settings, vibrant personalities, music, violence, sex, art and miscellany peppered my consciousness.

Finally, dazed, drained, almost delirious, I pressed the button and watched as a sea of drab green-gray nothingness enveloped the sreen and soothed my consternation.

I read a book instead.

ing billings reductions of any magnitude at all.

What's behind this surprising outlook for improvement in the advertising investment area? After all, this expectation contradicts many of the broader business and general economic indicators being reported now and noted by the panelists themselves.

One answer appears to be inflation and the anticipated higher cost of doing business. Clients are particularly sensitive to inflationary factors, with 40% offering this reason for their expected budget increases. Another 42% point to presumed media cost increases as contributing to their higher budget levels. In fact, only one in three of the clients notes that sales volume and revenue increases will play a significant role in establishing budget increases for 1983.

Norman Campbell, Tracy-Locke/-BBDO: Looking for signs of growth in heavy industries.

The agency side offers a markedly different pattern. Eight out of 10 expect their billings and revenue to increase as a result of new business or new assignments from current clients. Forty-nine per cent see budget increases coming from established brands.

Still, the agency leaders certainly don't seem blindly optimistic. They offer some pretty hard-nosed reasons for expecting good growth in the new year. Richard Seclow, president of Geer, Dubois, New York, forsees a high volume of new product activity. Others, such as Peter Barnes of Geers Gross, New York; Norman Campbell of Tracy-Locke/BBDO, and Joseph Hoffman of Ingalls Associates, Boston, all point out new areas of service they are offering, including sales promotion, direct marketing and public relations.

A more specialized view comes from Sy Davis, president of Adelante Advertising, who draws attention to the need for market targeting with agencies, as well as with products. "Many companies are turning to market segmentation to be more efficient in reaching their target audience," he says. "They've found by reaching the Hispanic or black markets . . . there's no wasted coverage. Selling those markets takes a specialist. . . ."

Over-all, these agency executives, as well as others in the panel, point to a no-nonsense pursuit of new accounts in growth sectors and a business-like, financially oriented control of all aspects of their operation as leading to improved performance in spite of the general business climate. Says James Doyle of D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius: "Agency [people are] becoming better businessmen on all fronts, hiring better, probably fewer people, more able people, providing us with a broader range of capabilities, more diversified services, charging for professional services sometimes given away in the past."

7. In reviewing your plans and programs for 1983, do you see any significant changes in strategy emerging?

On the market-planning front, several point to a much greater emphasis on specific product positioning and advertising claims at the expense of imagery or "soft-focus" advertising. They note a shorter life cycle for more brands, a tendency to "milk" obsolete or mature entries and deliberate expansion of only those new products that are proving themselves in test markets. It appears that corporate management is demanding that each brand justify its call on marketing funds by offering demonstrable sales and profit performance in the marketplace.

James Doyle, D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius: "We're becoming better businessmen on all fronts."

Other techniques expected to be pursued in 1983 are further attempts to sharpen the targeting of product positioning and, in fact, all aspects of the selling effort. Guiding the planning, as the panelists suggest, will be geographic concentration in "best" territories, a tighter prospect focus through demographically selective media, more pulsing and use of hiatuses to make weight work hardest when it counts most and an undeniable stress on pragmatic, no-nonsense selling points in creative work.

And, of course, all of this will be done against a backdrop of more frequent strategy reviews and of "playing much closer to the vest" with final commitment of ad funds.

'Yes . . . but'

The chairman of one of the largest consumer-oriented agencies says: "We expect most of the patterns of 1982 to continue until marketing and economic conditions are dramatically improved. We will try to lead clients to new approaches in the meantime."

Arthur Earley, president of Meldrum & Fewsmith, Cleveland, says: "We [will] see an extension into 1983 of basic approaches developed and put into operation in 1982. None of our clients is looking for big growth in 1983. They are planning with continued caution."

Richard Seclow, Geer, Dubois: Foreseeing high volume of new product activity.

8. Specifically with regard to new products and line extensions, how active do you expect your company (your agency's clients) to be in 1983?

The majority of the Sounding Board, 51%, expects its companies or agencies to be actively involved in the introduction or rolling out of new products. Just about four out of 10 are carefully studying new entries or ventures during the current year. In fact, fewer than one in seven terms his organization's new product activity inactive or "on hold" right now.

But here again, the surface appearance of traditional aggressiveness or euphoria doesn't hold up when we examine many of the volunteered explanatory comments.

Much of the new products activity the panelists note appears to stem more from a defensive need to fight competitors' moves and to maintain share rather than to pioneer for growth. Several corporate marketing executives, in a point echoed by some agency leaders commenting on their clients' practices, claim that their moves on the new products front are essentially to make up for erosion among declining, older products.

The grudging attitude that new products development work must go on, in bad times as well as good, is wide spread, according to our responses. Office products marketers, insurance companies, tobacco marketers, automotive supply organizations, fast-food franchisers, airlines, personal care products marketers and branded foods processors all expect to see continued notable activity among new products in 1983.

Once again, the sobering experiences of a troubled 1982 seem to have had a positive side effect: A pervasive sense of realism and care in the creation, introduction, investment in and rollout of new products. The board sees plenty of activity ahead, but with a definitive strategic purpose in mind and a strong dose of "show-me" accountability at work.

9. What do you feel are the most important negative factors or operating difficulties likely to affect your marketplace and advertising in 1983?

This open-ended question turned up strong evidence of the degree to which the general business climate must color the thinking of marketing and advertising people.

By far the most frequent response to this question dealt with various aspects of the economy—continued concerns about recessionary conditions dragging on well into 1983. Worries about a possible rebound in interest rates, unemployment persisting at discouragingly high levels, nagging problems of excess inventory and doubt about when consumer confidence (particularly affecting high-ticket durables purchases) would return to more normal levels—all these concerns are shared by a great majority of our panelists.

The panel expects a year of ongoing "selective recession," with many consumers continuing to be concerned about losing jobs and thus further postponing the purchases of houses, major appliances, automobiles and most other "big ticket" items.

Closer to their own sales and promotion activities, quite a few panelists pointed to difficulties and stresses in retailing—more intense price competition than ever with a great deal of price-cutting, and, therefore, further shaving of profit margins. Several panel members point out a growing trade reluctance to maintain historic inventory levels, resulting in more frequent out-of-stock situations and a stiffened resistance to taking on new products or line extensions.

Several board participants point to more and more "cheap, low quality merchandise" entries right across the consumer products and services spectrum, forcing an unhealthy "price" atmosphere in many markets. They are concerned that consumer disappointment will result in greater cynicism and a more cautious, difficult buyer.

Another persistent problem area for 1983 that some in our panel note involves what many term "unrealistic" media cost increases. The agency side singled out the tv networks for strong criticism because of major price increases at a time when both inflation rates decreased and audience levels eroded.

Says Richard Pike of Hunt-Wesson Foods: "Current demand for tv time has pushed rates up at 20% to 30% over year-ago levels while audience is actually trending down. We cannot absorb these costs and must find alternatives." His exasperation is echoed by top marketing executives with leading fast-food chains, insurance companies, wine importers, cosmetics houses, brewers and food companies—all significant users of the medium.

But despite the familiar difficulties and frustrations related to the ad business itself, the overwhelming reading on Sounding Board negatives for 1983 belong to the economic scene. David Weiner of Marketing Support, Chicago, says: "As the recession drags on, the biggest negative factor will remain fear: Fear of the company's future, fear of losing jobs, fear of new product failures, fear of bold recommendations. The experience of the recession for many executives has been terrifying."

10. In contrast, what particularly hopeful, upbeat signs do you see for our business this year?

As worrisome and concerned as the panel members are in their answers to our questions about negatives, there's undeniable hope and a good measure of optimism in seeing positive signals for 1983, when they are asked if the total picture will be more balanced.

There appears to be a general and growing realization that we've bottomed out and are preparing for a turnaround. According to Patrick McGrath, president of Jordan Case & McGrath, New York, this change in attitude is a crucial first step to recovery. Several board members point out that a fear of being left behind may provide a powerful impetus to rapid recovery in marketing and advertising—and very soon.

Other positive developments seen for the new year by our panel include further strides in healthy sectors and strong business gains for electronics, luxury goods, home decorating, leisure products and many package goods that offer good value to the careful buyer.

The board also sees many signs for optimism in further improving skills and practices—both more effective, disciplined marketing and advertising, as well as more professional management of the function itself.

Whether the subject is marketing strategy, creative development, media planning or promotion design, quite a few panelists see a new seriousness of purpose and a willingness to work harder at finding a competitive edge. This dedication to greater conscientiousness carries over—as another hopeful signal from the board for 1983—into organization and the management of people, resources and money.

Blair Vedder, vice-chairman of NH&S/New York, sees the situation in particularly hopeful terms. "Tough times demand boldness," he says. "Boldness, in part, requires challenging past practices. Advertising may begin to take on a new fresh look as a result of such challenge. I believe people will respond to this and our industry, as a whole, will benefit."

Robert Savage, president of Compton Advertising, sees a major opportunity for improved management in the current situation: "The year 1982 has been one of tightening the belt and becoming more efficient in agency operations. With increased fixed overhead costs, primarily rent, we have learned how to run our business more efficiently. We have reduced the number of people per million dollars of billing while upgrading the quality of the service we provide by having 'fewer but better' people. At the same time, a number of our clients have instituted stringent cost control programs that will make them more profitable and more efficient. Both agencies and clients should come out of this period better managed, more productive and more profitable."

Reminding us, however, that it is the customer, in the final analysis, who holds the key to strong new growth for marketing, Sy Davis of Adelante Advertising says: "In spite of the tight economy, the consumer (particularly the 18 to 29 year old) still maintains an optimistic outlook toward the future and still intends to enjoy living, purchasing the products that will reward him and her for their hard work."

Yes, 1982 was rough for most marketing organizations, beset as they were by difficult sales situations, the need for fast-acting promotion, maddeningly reluctant consumers, higher costs and elusive margins.

But these troubled times have been a good teacher as well. Marketing and advertising skills have continually been sharpened, and many in our Sounding Board see great new opportunity and challenge in the months ahead.

Saul Waring suggests that the agency business should set a goal of being "truly professional—to reinforce partnerships with clients and relate to the fact that the changes taking place are not an aberration, but part of a major change in the world economy (possibly as dramatic as the industrial revolution).

Patrick McGrath, Jordan Case & McGrath: Getting ready for a turnaround.

Norman Campbell underscores the messages by noting the centrally important role our business plays in the economy itself. He says, "Advertising and marketing can sustain and build businesses and brands even in recessionary periods." He further points out "that marketing can stimulate the marketplace and the over-all economy." But he also notes a special responsibility for marketing and advertising people as a result: "We should present documentation at every opportunity and encourage [our management and our clients] to become intelligently aggressive in their marketing efforts." That is certainly a tall order for American marketers and advertisers as they try to come to grips with 1983.

In the view of the ADVERTISING AGE Sounding Board a "yes . . . but" kind of year offers quite an exciting, and potentially very rewarding, situation for those of us who know how to read—and use—the signals.

Today's special: Minced media a la Mimi

NEW YORK—Want a lesson in how to keep newspaper writers at bay? Don't bother hiring lawyers to seek out judges who will issue restraining orders or send the poor slob to the slammer. And don't waste time, as President Reagan has, complaining that you have had it with leaks and leakers. There's a much simpler way.

Michael (Buzzy) O'Keeffe recently opened a lovely restaurant in Manhattan and, while he is interested in any publicity he can get for his venture, he doesn't want serious-minded food reporters dining at his establishment and writing about its fare.

One evening, in walked restaurant reviewer-food reporter Mimi Sheraton of the New York Times with four guests. While Ms. Sheraton usually is unrecognized by restaurant people, the maitre d'hotel in this place came over to her table and whispered, according to Ms. Sheraton's account in the Jan. 7 Times, "We have reason to believe there are food critics at this table."

Ms. Sheraton confirmed this suspicion and the maitre d' said, "The management feels we are not ready to serve food critics at this time, and we must ask you to leave." It worked. Ms. Sheraton and her party departed. And Times readers who follow Ms. Sheraton's reviews would read only her account of Mr. O'Keeffe's hospitality; they would get no learned discussion of the restaurant's cuisine from her.

■ The Times, which made history in the Pentagon Papers action and in other landmark First Amendment cases, apparently let this ouster stand. After all, it's not as if a Times reporter was being booted out of Moscow. Or is it? I can only assume that if the maitre d' had said, "We have reason to believe there are newspaper reporters at this table," a major legal battle would have ensued.

Is this, then, the key to bouncing reporters from the premises? You don't call them reporters. Call them food critics, or anything else, and ask them to leave. The possibilities are unlimited. Is there a newly elected government official taking office? A mayor, governor? A new President one day might stroll into the White House pressroom and say, "I have reason to believe there are political analysts in this room." (Note that the use of the word "reporter" has been avoided.) The President continues, "I feel I am not yet ready, in this, my first term in office, to be analyzed or reviewed and I must ask you to leave at this time." And as Germond & Witcover, James Reston, Evans & Novak, Tom Wicker, James Fallows, David Broder and William Safire immediately leap from their typewriters and hasten to fetch their coats and leave, the Prez calls after them, "Don't call me; I'll call you."

This tactic can be applied to any business or service activity around, I'm sure. The trick is to remember to avoid the use of that word. Of course, if the food critic, or political columnist or whatever, happens to mention, "But I'm a newspaper reporter," all bets are off.

Cover Story: California magazine for January reported that the Los Angeles County Bar Assn. magazine, Los Angeles Lawyer, had tested a new approach to collecting unpaid membership dues. On its October issue, it printed in large red letters the words "Past Due" and sent 2,400 of these copies to dues-delinquent lawyers.

I asked Janice Tesler, LACBA director of member services, how the experiment worked out. "It was not terribly successful," she said. The hoped-for "flood of checks" didn't materialize. Ms. Tesler explained that "these were hardened cases," lawyers who had already ignored three delinquency notices and three letters between March and June. Advertisers didn't complain about the overprint treatment, she said, but some of the paid-up members thought it was "overly hard-sell." Generally, the members "ignored the whole thing, which may have been what it deserved all along." Ms. Tesler added that the experiment will not be repeated.

I have another idea: Install neon signs in courtrooms so that when a dues-skipper approaches the bench, the sign lights up and spells: "Deadbeat."

Billyballet: Billy Martin's traditional return-to-the-Yankees-and-George Steinbrenner took place on schedule this month in New York. Baseball's version of Liz and Richard Burton engaged in a comedy routine, as though they were filming another Miller Lite commercial. The act called for Steinbrenner to complain loudly every time Martin told how he, Martin, would run the team without interference from the owner. After Martin said he would handle the trades, Steinbrenner roared: "I'm handling the trades. If you don't like it, you're fired." And Martin replied, "You haven't hired me yet." (Laughter among the sportswriters.) I guess the scriptwriter for this act figures that even if it isn't funny and the pay is low, at least it's a steady job.

MediaMeandering: Seems that Philadelphia Eagles' coach Dick Vermeil's resignation is a direct result of the NFL strike. Freed of those 18 to 20-hour days he used to put in at the stadium, his wife reported, Vermeil discovered "changing trees, the colors in the fields." She added: "You know, I think he thought that all fields were green with white stripes on them." White stripes? When will he learn that fields come with bases 90 ft. apart?#

Distilled spirits sales fade

By JOHN C. MAXWELL JR.

The distilled spirits industry was down once again in 1982 for the third year in a row. At mid-December the estimated unit volume drop was 2%, and that was in anticipation of a good pickup over the final weeks.

Just about all the major product areas experienced drops, with the exception of U.S.-bottled Canadian and some specialty items such as brandies, liqueurs and cordials.

While much of this softness has to do with the recession, as we have pointed out before, life styles are moving away from alcoholic beverages and more into soft drinks and other such products. Further, there is a sense that various steps should be taken to make drinking more difficult. Minimum drinking ages are being raised, drunken-driving laws are being more strictly enforced, etc.

We point to some Scandinavian countries that have substantially raised prices at retail levels, more to dissuade people from drinking than to raise money. This example may pose a problem here. We considered the cigaret excise tax increase to be sort of a bell cow, in that legislators would find it difficult to pass other excise taxes if they could not get this one through. It went through in a breeze, and we now believe there will be more excise taxes coming to the floor within the next six to nine months.

There is the added probability that the states, most of which are in the red, will use alcoholic beverages as a whipping boy to close budget deficits. Thus we feel that the industry will remain under pressure from these sources over the coming months and years, and we do not see much hope for industry growth.

Looking at the individual companies, Brown-Forman Distillers and National Distillers stand out. In each case, nearly all their major brands showed some 1982 growth and in the particular case of National Distillers, it had several brands growing in the double-digit area. National has taken on a more aggressive sales, pricing and advertising mode that is obviously paying off. On the one side, the price of Old Crow was reduced and, on the other side, the company instituted a taste comparison with Windsor Supreme against V.O. (along the same lines as the Pepsi challenge) with obvious good results.

Kamchatka showed one of the largest leaps in position, moving from 19th place to 15th, with other products exhibiting radical position changes being Brown-Forman's Early Times (which moved from 23rd to 21st), National's Gilbey's vodka (19th to 17th), Canadian Mist (10th to eighth) and Windsor Supreme (eighth to sixth). Brown-Forman's Jack Daniel's moved into fourth position from sixth, bypassing Jim Beam.

It is interesting to point out here that the premium brands have not done all that badly in this unfortunate market. Bacardi continues to hold the No. 1 spot, up almost 3% and widening its gap against Heublein's Smirnoff, still No. 2. Tanqueray, which advertises itself as the highest-price imported gin, remained even despite a 2% decline in the gin market.

Thus, as we scan the industry, it would appear that premiums like those mentioned above are doing well, as are brands at the low end of the market such as Brown-Forman's Canadian Mist, up almost 12%. It is also interesting to note that the specialty items continue to grow, [illegible] Kahlua and Baileys Irish [illegible] the latter having passed [illegible] million case mark, up almost [illegible] in the largest percentage [illegible] within the rankings.#

Nude Beer fight won't die

By RUTH STROUD

TUSTIN, CAL.—Nude Beer simply won't cover up.

The bottle with the bare-breasted woman on the label (AA, Oct. 18) is causing havoc in the California courts and angering officials in New Jersey, where the beer is brewed.

Its promoter, William Boam, president of WFB Mfg., has filed a $100 million lawsuit against the California Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, claiming it has held up a decision about whether he can sell the product in California. He is threatening to follow with a $1 billion action against the state of New Jersey for restraint of trade in not allowing him to ship the brew overseas despite federal approval.

The California case, which officials say marks the first time a label disapproved on the basis of contents has been contested in the state courts, was decided in Mr. Boam's favor last month by Sacramento administrative law judge Charles Bobby.

But the ruling has been held up by members of the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control "who are trying to promote their own individual beliefs as opposed to doing what they're supposed to do," according to Mr. Boam's attorney, Jeffrey Walsworth.

While awaiting the latest ruling from the California department, which is expected Feb. 7, Mr. Boam has prepared an alternate label, featuring a bikini-clad woman, which he plans to submit to the department. He also has started distribution of Nude Beer Nuts, glass containers of dry roasted peanuts with two photographs of bare-breasted women on the label.#

Post Co. buys electronic database publisher

WASHINGTON—The Washington Post Co. has bought into the electronic database publishing business, the first purchase by the company under its electronics-minded president, Richard Simmons.

Under the Simmons regime, the Post Co. also is seeking government licenses to operate new cellular telephone services.

The acquisition, for an undisclosed price, of Legi-Slate gives the Post Co. a vehicle with major expansion possibilities. Legi-Slate, a sophisticated two-way data service, tracks legislation and regulation daily by electronically chronicling the "Congressional Record" and "Federal Register," the official billboards of the U.S. government.

The same type of coverage of the Texas state legislature is provided, and Legi-Slate founder Curtiss Grove, who will continue to head the operation for the Post Co., believes state-by-state expansion is an exciting prospect.

Legi-Slate currently serves more than 250 clients, providing synopses of all legislation, congressional actions, floor votes and regulatory agency actions. The information is updated daily.

Mr. Grove, 51, once a research executive for McCann-Erickson, Chicago, believes there is potential for adding editorial copy from the Washington Post and Newsweek to the data offered by Legi-Slate.#

FCB unravels Aitkin woes

By GAY JERVEY

Foote, Cone & Belding continues s investigation into financial ir- egularities at its Philadelphia- ased subsidiary Aitkin-Kynett, ut already it appears that the mount of money involved is uch greater than originally be- eved (AA, Jan. 31).

According to Aitkin chairman ohn Newhall, "embezzlement"— "defalcation" as he stresses is e correct legal term—has been anspiring since 1979 and pri- arily involved the issuing and ashing of unauthorized checks. n executive who no longer works the agency is under suspicion.

Although neither Mr. Newhall or FCB senior vp-finance Allan ilson would confirm any figure, sources in Philadelphia are placing it in six-figures, with some estimates exceeding $200,000.

"We have an idea of how much money is unaccounted for," said Mr. Newhall, who explained that due to the labyrinthine process of piecing together the defalcation, he could not be more specific. "It takes a long time to unravel the various ways this was done, the deceptive practices. It could take as long as six months."

■ He added that other, far less ominous reasons, e.g., routine accounting errors, could account for some of the discrepancies.

Said Mr. Wilson: "The state of our investigation at this point just would not allow me to confirm or

JWT demands ad rate pledges

By STUART J. ELLIOTT

NEW YORK—Spurred by reports of magazines breaking ad rates, J. Walter Thompson USA has gone ahead with plans to solicit pledges from publishers affirming they give the agency's clients "the lowest rates available."

The letter, a copy of which was obtained by ADVERTISING AGE, states that JWT will "support the system of buying by published rates" if a magazine "adheres strictly to its published rates."

But if magazines are making deals, the letter reminds publishers of a clause in the agency's order and contract forms that calls on them to "make an appropriate pro rata rebate" if space is sold to others at lower cpms.

The letter, dated Jan. 21, asks the publishers to "note, sign and return a copy" which will be provided to them by JWT's media directors, who "would like something in hand to show their clients acknowledging that you are aware of our position and that you continue to be in accord with our terms." It is signed by Thurman Pierce, vp-U.S. manager, print media.

Amidst reports that magazines were bending their rate cards in order to snare business during these tough times, JWT had earlier said it was thinking of seeking assurances that it was buying at the best available rates (AA, Nov. 1 et seq.). Concern over the problem prompted JWT to dispatch the letter, a spokesman said. Most major agencies have such clauses in their order and contract forms, but JWT is one of the first to jog the magazines' memory in the wake of reports of widespread rate-breaking. NH&S/New York says it has been

Yardley's Laughter for teens

By PAT SLOAN

While the fragrance industry has for all intents and purposes abandoned teen-oriented colognes and perfumes, Jovan Inc.'s Yardley of London division will bring out its own this spring under the girlish name of Laughter.

"We've looked at the entire market and found this the one area that's lacked development," said Thomas R.P. Measday, vp-general manager of Chicago-based Yardley.

Admitting that might be because the subcategory also has been a problem area for most of the industry, and virtually is controlled by two companies, Chattem's Love and Avon Products, Mr. Measday nevertheless believes the market has a $120 million potential at retail and is key to cultivating fragrance usage at an early age.

Through its two teen fragrances, Sweet Honesty and Zany, Avon is said to have built at least a $35 million-to-$40 million volume in the business, Mr. Measday said, "though no one really knows what Avon does."

Laughter's pricing is 25% less than that on Avon brands and "a Cartridge share plummets; can Atari recover?

By BOB MARICH

Atari's market share for videogame cartridges dropped 32% last year, according to one market analyst, with a disastrous fourth-quarter selling season contributing heavily to this nose dive.

The preliminary analysis, by A.G. Becker's Tony Hoffman, is one of the first estimates of the post-Christmas, 1982, videogame software marketplace. The study pegs the Warner Communications subsidiary's cartridge shipments for Atari's VCS console, which is also designated the 2600, at 32 million units. This amounts to 58% of the estimated 55.6 million VCS-format game cartridges shipped by the industry last year. In 1981, Mr. Hoffman estimated Atari's share in the same VCS-cartridge market was 90% of 29.3 million cartridges shipped. In units, this translated to 26.5 million Atari cartridges.

But Mr. Hoffman's 1982 estimate indicates that Atari continued as the clear leader among VCS cartridge marketers. Others were Activision with 11 million cartridges (20% market share), Coleco with 5 million (9%), Parker Bros. with 4 million (7%) and Imagic with 3 million (5%). Shipments by the remaining smaller marketers (including Mattel's M Network and U.S. Games) amounted to just 600,000, representing about 1%, according to Mr. Hoffman.

He cautioned that "millions" of cartridges shipped in '82 have not sold through to consumers as yet. Older Atari cartridges represent the largest surplus, he believes. He added a caveat that a better picture will emerge when all the software marketers reveal their fourth-quarter sales figures.

Ads, subscriber solicitations begin

'TV-Cable Week' debut sites set

By SUSAN SPILLMAN

Time Inc.'s TV-Cable Week tells its advertisers this week that the new guide's April 10 debut will be in Arlington, Tex., Audubon, N.J., Grand Rapids, Mich., Peoria, Ill. and two cities in South Florida.

A major media campaign, including spot tv, direct mail and cable advertising, will support in those markets, according to publisher Dan Zucchi, and in fact, already has broken. Radio and newspaper ads will eventually be added, he said, but the media mix in each market will be determined on a case-by-case basis. Ted Bates Advertising/New York handles.

As earlier reported, TV-Cable Week got off to a fast start with advertisers—specifically, a 600 ad-page committment before publishing a rate card (AA, Dec. 13).

The Audubon cable system, owned by the New York Times Co., has 93,900 subscribers and is the nation's ninth-largest. Both the Grand Rapids system (at 71,100 subscribers, the country's 17th-largest) and the system in Peoria (with 46,500 subscribers) are owned by General Electric. The two independent cable operations in South Florida are in Pompano, with 50,000 subscribers, and Fort Lauderdale, with 35,500 subscribers.

While these are the only markets where direct-subscriber solicitation has begun, Mr. Zucchi said several other systems are expected to be on line by April and a number of others will sign up soon after that.

Industry sources said that among those systems expected soon to market TV-Cable Week to their subscribers are the Time Inc.-owned systems in Austin, Tex. (83,500 subscribers), and Orlando (76,100 subscribers).#

Solution seen in limiting net syndication

By MAURINE CHRISTOPHER

With both the major networks and the independent tv stations finding something to cheer about in Justice Department's suggestions for revamped program syndication and financial interest policies, industry observers are wondering if Justice has opened a dialog that will lead to a compromise solution.

All three major networks were pleased that Justice supported their request that the Federal Communications Commission lift the rules keeping them out of domestic syndication and prime time co-production. Emphasizing the upbeat, they appeared to be postponing concern over the antitrust guardian's suggestions for alternate, more narrow domestic syndication rules to keep tv's Big 3 from dominating the offnet syndication market should FCC barriers be lowered.

It was this section of the department's filing that brought encouragement to one of the networks' most aggressive opponents, the Assn. of Independent TV Stations. It pointed out that Justice felt the networks will continue to be so strong, despite competition from new video rivals, that independents, advertisers and viewers will need to be protected from potentially collusive behavior.

The Justice Department indicated particular concern over the importance of offnet series to independents in programing their most valuable time period—late afternoon and early evening. The Justice filing gave several possible optional replacement rules, including one that would allow the networks to obtain offnet syndie rights to up to 50% of their prime time schedule. Another possibility: Let the Big 3 have a minority syndication interest in all their shows.

An INTV lawyer also found the filing encouraging as a harbinger of how the consent decree problem might be handled. All three networks now are banned from syndication and prime time co-financing by consent decrees and FCC rules. "We think they will insist on the same kind of protection against network dominance in the offnet syndication market if the decrees are revised," he said.

The Assn. of National Advertisers is expected to react coolly to the Justice Department's proposed revisions. ANA has not completed its study of the Justice file, but a source there was skeptical about just how much protection Justice's suggested options would afford independents and advertisers.#

Sunglass makers pin hopes on ad visibility

By PAT SLOAN

Sunglass marketers saw the economy reflected in their sales figures last year: Unit volume declined to 72 million pairs from 86 million pairs in 1981; dollar sales dropped to $720 million, from $870 million.

Nevertheless, the industry appears undaunted as it deals with plans for 1983, calling for a recovery based on expectations of higher advertising spending, new introductions and cooperative weather.

"Last year the entire industry spent $3.5 million on advertising, and this year we alone will spend $6 million," said Chris Mather, product manager for Corning Glass Works' new Serengeti and Chameleon sunglasses lines (AA, Nov. 15).

"With that kind of advertising, and if there's reasonably good weather from March to June, the. . .market should be terrific this year," he added.

The Corning, N.Y.-based company is not alone among sunglass marketers with plans for extensive advertising. Bausch & Lomb will put a full marketing program behind its Mirage and Expressions lines this year. Miami-based Visual Scene, a marketer that works with imports, is heralding a major tv drive for 1983, with print support, through its agency, Antman Advertising. Foster Grant, said a spokesman, will see "some expansion of the ad budget along with a new campaign."

Leominster, Pa.-based Foster Grant will abandon "The flight"-themed commercials it has run in years past and air 30-second spots on NBC's "Today" and ABC's "Good Morning America." The company's ad effort, via longtime agency Geer, DuBois, is dubbed "100 Days of Foster Grant" and includes a 20-week flight of commercials that use talent from both morning tv shows as spokeswomen. They are Nancy Foreman, a life-style reporter for NBC's "Today," and Kathie Lee Johnson, who will fill in for "Good Morning America" reporter-interviewer-hostess Joan Lunden, now nearing maternity leave.

Considered more educational in nature than previous Foster Grant commercials, the new commercials come at a time when industry sources place traditional Foster Grant sales down by 30% and give poor marks to the company's introduction of Vidal Sassoon shades last year.

The Foster Grant executive admitted sales were off, but added, "decreases were pretty much in line with the industry's. There was some loss in share but generally those figures held up."

Sassoon, he said, "did not live up to our expectations basically, we believe, because it was a high-price line introduced at the wrong moment."

There are now no advertising plans for Sassoon, although the line is still in stores. (Curiously, Foster Grant is planning an ad test for a line of reading glasses that are prescription strength but sold without a prescription. Most states allow this kind of sale, the spokesman said, and the cost of such over-the-counter reading glasses is significantly less to the consumer than prescribed lenses.)

Foster Grant introduced Sassoon sunglasses last year in the $16-to-$20 price spread, betting that there was room for market growth in the higher price ranges. Now, the company says the growth just isn't at that end of the market. Competitors attribute the line's weak showing to styling that was perhaps too flashy, and difficulties in building a Sassoon franchise in anything but haircare. But the Foster Grant spokesman emphasized, "I certainly wouldn't want to bring out anything higher priced at this point."

Yet that is exactly what Corning and Rochester, N.Y.-based Bausch & Lomb are doing with their newest lines. The two companies see profit gains in the higher-price segments of the sunglass category, where unit growth eventually could total 10% annually.

Bausch & Lomb's consumer products division introduced its Mirage and Expressions lines last year, but because of a companywide reorganization, marketing plans were not implemented on schedule.

Handicapped by a late start and the general deterioration of the market to boot, Mirage and Expressions did not enjoy a problem-free first year.

Priced at more than $20 and targeted to consumers shopping in optical stores, department stores and independent drugstores, the lines will be back this year with a full marketing program, one that includes advertising, something the glasses lacked in 1982.

While 90% of all sunglass units sold are priced less than $20, those above $20 account for $300 million in retail volume, according to Lee Hill, Bausch & Lomb vp-marketing and sales worldwide. Above $20, optical stores account for 41% of all sunglass dollar volume, followed by department stores, which account for 20% of dollar volume.

The question, however, has been how to get a significant number of consumers to trade up to pricier lines. According to Bausch & Lomb data, only 25% of sunglass purchases at prices above $20 are made on impulse, while those selling for less than $20 have a 50% impulse-purchase percentage. With the more than $20 glasses, 75% of purchases are planned.

Bausch & Lomb's answer to this question in part is to emphasize optical outlets this year. In that way, B&L believes it will be able to reach the 6 million consumers who already buy its contact lens products. Last year, independent drugstores were the biggest single outlet for its new sunglasses.

Bausch & Lomb remains the dominant contact lens producer, with above-average profitability despite competition from Continuous Curve, CooperVision and American Hydron, according to Salomon Brothers investment advisory service.

Playing on its equity in a quality image, Bausch & Lomb will more closely relate the two brands to its corporate heritage. Packaging and advertising from Hutchins/Y&R, Rochester, will spotlight the Bausch & Lomb name along with product quality information and a one-year limited warranty against breakage.

But mindful that fashion remains the main consideration behind sunglass purchases, the company's ad campaign will be themed around "That famous feeling" and the perennial paparazzi quest for celebrities at whom they can aim their cameras. The message is that Mirage and Expressions, and the wearers of them, will be noticed.

Interestingly, Bausch & Lomb will also offer a $3 rebate to any consumer buying either Mirage or Expressions and one of its contact lens solutions.

Like Corning, Bausch & Lomb seems to be identifying price voids in the market in order to build share. While Corning's Chameleon is priced from $12 to $25 to compete against Foster Grant, its Serengeti is positioned to compete against both Ray-Ban at the lower range of the high-price market ($41 to $70) and Porsche-Carrera at the top. Mirage and Expressions are in the high-$20s range, where Bausch & Lomb believes there is little or no competition. Bausch & Lomb plans to bring out another sunglass line, Wings, priced at around $60 and aimed at the sort of "Members Only" consumer, according to Mr. Hill.

Whether this upward-creeping price segmentation will work remains to be seen. Although a Bausch & Lomb breakdown of sales in 1982 pinpoints category strength in the $20-to-$40 range, the average price paid by a department store consumer for a pair of sunglasses was $12.12 last year. In optical outlets, the average price was $18.29, and in drugstores the average checkout price was only $9.58.

Some department stores also have chosen to discount sunglasses heavily. While the discounts have produced gains where taken, they also point to the retail maxim that a product's true price is only what it eventually sells for, not its original price tag.#

Jovan, Omni feel Richardson-Vicks' wrath

By PAT SLOAN

The litigious Richardson-Vicks ce again is taking a competitor to ırt. The defendants this time are echam Ltd.'s Jovan division and Omni subsidiary.

n the suit filed in Chicago fedl district court, Richardson-cks' Oil of Olay subsidiary ales unfair trade practices, prod- disparagement and deceptive vertising by Jovan and Omni for ni's about-to-be introduced 2nd but Moisture Retention lotion d cream. The company is seeking $5 million in damages and an injunction barring the ads.

A hearing on the suit has been set for March 8.

Advertising created by Jovan's former agency J. Walter Thompson USA has not yet broken, but Richardson-Vicks presumably was alerted to its content by the trade.

The controversy appears to center around Jovan's use of an independent laboratory to measure the moisture retention properties of 2nd Debut against its competitors, including one that is referred to as "the leading beauty fluid." A graph of the results traces moisture level readings over 12 hours. It then shows high moisture levels for 12 hours for women who used 2nd Debut while charting the "leading beauty fluid" as having little better moisture retention level than no moisturizer whatsoever.

The Oil of Olay suit claims those findings are false because "they are based upon the use of a machine that purports to measure the effects of different kinds of moisturizers on the skin when, in fact, the machine is inappropriate for that purpose," Olay said.

At least one industry executive contended that such measurement is not uncommon in the cosmetics and skincare category.

In July, 1978, Oil of Olay won four cases against products considered to be highly imitative. These included Life Laboratories' Oil of Life product, whose packaging was found to be deceptively imitative and was ordered changed. That product was pulled from the market in April, 1979. Jovan subsequently was sued in 1980 by Life Labs for using the trade name Oil of Life. Although Life Labs was denied a preliminary injunction that decision was later reversed, and Jovan was forced to stop using the Oil of Life name.

Last August, Richardson-Vicks settled a suit against General Nutrition Centers for selling hair and skincare products that caused confusion by their packaging similarities to its Mill Creek natural hair and skincare products. GNC agreed to stop selling the products by Nov. 1, 1982, to repackage its line and to pay unspecified monetary damages to Richardson-Vicks.

It also has a suit in process against Cococare Products, claiming the packaging on its moisturizer is imitative.

Oil of Olay now has about a 30% share, according to R-V. But that share, though still the largest share of any skincare marketer, is down from 34% in 1981.#

jections because of soft cardge sales (AA, Dec. 13), Atari's st costly mistake was believing novie license could translate into it cartridge, even without excit game play, Mr. Hoffman said.

ari's would-be fourth-quarter ne blockbusters "E.T." and aiders of the Lost Ark" were the prits. Only "E.T." has emerged a moderate success.

I think the story of last year is fully told yet," added Michele eston, an analyst at Cyrus J. wrence Inc. Her estimate puts Atari VCS cartridge total at 30 llion units, or 2 million fewer n Mr. Hoffman's estimate.

Atari is trying all sorts of stockancing programs with its retail to try to take care of this prob, so they don't have to take an entory writedown," she contin. "I think the jury's still out on ether it will succeed." (Warner mmunications is expected to ret sales in April.)

Prices of both consoles and cardges have fallen as marketers ned to discounting as early as fall.

Mr. Hoffman said that Atari ne software sales can be exted to rebound in the first half 1983 because home versions of coin-operated arcade games l be introduced. These include S cartridges of Centipede, Ms. -Man, Phoenix and Galaxian.

While 55.6 million cartridges is shipment estimate for VCSnpatible software, Mr. Hoffman ieves that when cartridges for er videogames like Mattel's Inivision, Coleco's own ColecoVin and Magnavox's Odyssey 2 are luded, the total rises to 65 miln units. (Ms. Preston's figure s 65 million to 70 million cardge units.) As a result, cartridge es topped $2 billion at retail.

While Atari took a bath in softre, its console shipments held amounting to 5.75 million VCSe units in 1982, Mr. Hoffman d. This accounted for 58% of the 5 million units of the dedicated leogame market (excluding mbination videogame/home nputer units) that were shipped.

Atari's second-generation 5200 eogame console (not compatible h the VCS player) shipped and d 600,000 units (6% share) after ng introduced late in the year, Hoffman said. This gives ri's 2600 and 5200 consoles a nbined 64% market share.

n 1981, facing fewer competi, Atari shipped 3.05 million S consoles, holding a 67% share he 4.55 million videogame con market that year.

t the end of 1982, Mr. Hoffman red about one-half million vidame consoles remain in inven with distributors or retailers.

prices continue to come down, ri could still sell between 3 mil and 4.5 million VCS consoles 983, Mr. Hoffman predicted, pite stiff competition from adced units such as ColecoVision, improved Intellivision and i's own 5200.#

Coffee group lines up sports stars for drive

By GAY JERVEY

The National Coffee Assn. breaks its $24 million generic advertising campaign this spring, a long-awaited effort aimed at reversing a 20-year decline in coffee consumption.

With a "Join the coffee achievers" theme, the Advertising to Women-created campaign will utilize eight celebrities, NCA spokesman Dave Kuhnert said. It will target young people—a new Pepsi generation, if you will—who don't count coffee in their frequent, habitual beverage repertoire. "We want to equate achievement and success with the beverage," Mr. Kuhnert said.

The first personalities to be contracted for the tv and radio campaign are sports figures—Cincinnati Bengals quarterback Ken Anderson and one-time New York City Marathon winner Allison Roe. New York marketing consultant Dan Dolgins serves as the campaign's coordinator.

Music purchased from Electric Light Orchestra rock group, "Hold on Tight to Your Dreams," will be a central part of the spots, which will note that coffee "both calms you down and picks you up."

According to Mr. Kuhnert, the first salvo in the campaign will involve advertising directed at the critical foodservice industry. Ads will urge restaurants and institutions "to serve better quality coffee," the NCA executive said. In September, the second phase will involve a consumer network tv and radio campaign aimed at the 20-to-30 age group that has been weaned on soft drinks.

■ The campaign has been long discussed in the coffee industry. Figures show U.S. coffee consumption on a per capita basis dropped from 3.12 cups per day in 1962 to 1.9 cups per day in 1982. It was first announced in August, 1981, with the agency appointment made the following month.

"There is a whole group out there who have been culturalized to sweet, preferably cold drinks," said a former coffee executive. "They have also lived through a decade of largely negative publicity about coffee. Thus, we saw the steady and consistent erosion of the entire category."

Funding comes from the NCA, comprised of roasters and others allied with the industry, and the International Coffee Organization, London, comprised of coffee-pro-

Paul's, Van de Kamp's in fish market slugfest

By NANCY GIGES and JENNIFER PENDLETON

A major fish fight is breaking out.

Starting today, Mrs. Paul's Kitchens—the longtime leader of the $600 million-plus frozen fish market, which has lost share as a result of the aggressiveness of two once-regional brands—introduces an improved line of fish sticks and fish fillets designed to force competitor Van de Kamp's to stop running comparative advertising claiming product superiority. The ad expenditure will be $4.6 million just between now and the end of March.

And while that bait is dangling in front of consumers, Long Beach, Cal.-based Van de Kamp's Frozen Foods will move into test markets with a new product that claims to be "fresher than fresh"—a frozen fish fillet called Today's Catch.

Designed to create a new market for frozen fish among the large numbers of consumers who enjoy fish but refrain from buying it in supermarkets because of concerns about quality, Van de Kamp's describes Today's Catch as a significant innovation; it is actually headed, gutted and frozen onboard ship minutes after it's caught,

Sweeps fare may deliver record net viewing levels

By DIANE MERMIGAS

ABC's "Winds of War" swept the prime time ratings scene last week, averaging a 39.3 rating, 54% share of the national tv audience for the first four nights that, if sustained through Sunday's conclusion, will make it the second-highest rated miniseries of all time, behind its own "Roots."

That could provide ABC with enough ratings momentum to win the February sweeps.

But it remains uncertain whether the total ratings average for "Winds," coupled with the ratings performance of "The Thorn Birds" in late March and ABC's new "second season" limited series (like "Condo," "Amanda's," "At Ease" and "Renegades") will be enough to slide the network past CBS in the season-long prime time ratings sweepstakes (AA, Feb. 7). Most observers still believe CBS will win in a close call.

The barrage of special sweeps programing that dominated prime time last week temporarily boosted the networks' declining combined share of the national tv audience each night. The networks' combined share of audience the first four nights of "Winds" was the highest on Feb. 7, with a 94 compared to a Monday night season average of about 82. The combined network rating on Monday, which was 69.6, also was the highest of the first four nights.

The networks managed to attract a 100% share of the nation's tv viewers 10:30 p.m. to 11 p.m. Feb. 7, on the strength of "Winds," NBC's "Television's Greatest Commercials" and CBS' tv movie "Packin' It In."

Over-all hut (homes using television) or viewing levels, which is the percentage of homes in U.S. watching tv, also skyrocketed last week compared to a year ago, and generally were up an average 5 million-to-6 million tv households from February, 1982. For instance, on Feb. 6, viewing levels reached 72.4, com-

Y&R the loser as Ford shifts corporate ads

By RALPH GRAY and JAY McCORMICK

DEARBORN, MICH.—Ford reshuffled its corporate and North American Automotive Operations marketing structure again. Young & Rubicam loses, Wells, Rich, Greene wins and J. Walter Thompson USA ties.

Y&R will give up the NAAO "Quality is Job 1" campaign, with an estimated budget of at least $13 million, at the end of the model year.

Thompson will lose a slightly smaller NAAO image campaign that stars racer Jackie Stewart, but most of the money from that campaign will return, along with Mr. Stewart, to JWT via the Ford division account.

The Q1 campaign will be folded in with the Ford corporate ads, "There's a Ford in America's Future," handled by WRG. WRG created the Q1 campaign for Ford corporate and handled it until last spring when NAAO grabbed control of its own advertising, installing Y&R, the Lincoln-Mercury agency.

"It was a matter of streamlining the operation," said a NAAO spokesman in explaining the new shift. Image advertising had

Ad hoc nets rapped as threat to free tv

By CRAIG REISS

NEW YORK—While the heads of the Big 3 tv networks adopt a wait-and-see approach to the latest wave of ad hoc tv network proposals, there are rumblings in network executive suites to the effect that the movement could threaten the future of free tv.

"This kind of thing has been tried before and it hasn't worked," said ABC Network TV president James Duffy. "If the independent stations can get together among themselves, more power to them. But if this kind of thing starts to involve network affiliates, then it will tear down the system of free television that we know today."

Mr. Duffy was responding to proposals from McCann-Erickson, Metromedia and film producers for stations, both independent and network-affiliated, to clear one night each week to run theatrical films that have not been shown on network tv (AA, Jan. 24, et seq.). His comments, however, were clearly targeted at Metromedia, which operates seven tv stations currently, including an ABC and an NBC affiliate.

"Metromedia is not just independent stations," said Mr. Duffy. "If they have their affiliated stations preempt the network programs on a sometimes basis, they will be contributing to the short-circuiting of the supply of network programing in the long run. It is a shortsighted view on their part."

This latest spate of activity on the ad hoc network front was launched at the Assn. of Independent Television Stations convention in Los Angeles last month, when Showtime senior vp-programing Greg Nathanson called on independents to join with the pay cable service in securing syndication rights to feature films, and when McCann's media chief Gene

'M*A*S*H' a lesson in affiliate relations

NEW YORK—For the third time in three weeks, the Feb. 28 final episode of "M*A*S*H" has been rescheduled by CBS-TV.

Since the start of the year, the heavily promoted "M*A*S*H" finale, originally slotted from 9 p.m. to 11 p.m. (ET), has been expanded to 2½ hours and scheduled to start at 8:30 p.m., then pushed up to 8 p.m., and finally moved back to 8:30 p.m.

The activity reveals the delicate diplomacy required in handling network affiliate relations. It also underscores the power of the affiliates to force the network to compromise, as well as the high stakes involved in a one-time-only special expected to pull a national audience rating of between 45 and 50.

The question of when to start the "M*A*S*H" finale has been pending since the CBS regional affiliates meeting in Arizona last month. At that time, CBS Entertainment reported that additional footage beyond the anticipated two-hour special was good enough to warrant expanding the episode a half-hour. The affiliates quickly voiced the hope that the overrun would not cut into their local news, since these stations see the "M*A*S*H" finale as a powerful lead-in to the news at the end of the February ratings sweeps period.

The network responded by moving the starting time for "M*A*S*H" to 8:30 p.m. This also would enable CBS to help "Alice." That CBS series, lifted earlier from the prime time schedule, was being given a second chance by being slotted as the "M*A*S*H" lead-in.

But at least 13 of the 18 CBS affiliates in the top 75 markets that held syndication rights to "M*A*S*H" informed the network that they would be preempting "Alice" at 8 p.m. to run the original pilot to "M*A*S*H," making Feb. 28 an all-"M*A*S*H" night. At the same time, NBC said it would begin its movie that night, "The Night the Bridge Fell Down," at 8 p.m.

As a result, the network moved "M*A*S*H" up to 8 p.m., countering the NBC movie's potential impact and forcing affiliates still bent on preempting "Alice" at 10:30 p.m. to run the "M*A*S*H" pilot after the finale—a move that station managers agreed weakened the impact and logic of the preemption.

Nevertheless, CBS affiliates in Dayton, Memphis, New Orleans and Syracuse went ahead with plans to preempt "Alice" at 10:30 p.m. in favor of the "M*A*S*H" pilot or an expanded local news show centered on the "M*A*S*H" theme. At least four other markets still were considering preempting "Alice" as of Feb. 8.

And still the cries went out from the affiliates to the networks, bitterly complaining that the 8 p.m. starting time sabotaged their opportunity to use the "M*A*S*H" finale as a lead-in to local news.

From all this came last week's solution. According to station programers, CBS affiliate relations executives told the affiliates that the entertainment division was resisting rescheduling "M*A*S*H" back to 8:30 p.m. since it feared even greater preempting of "Alice" at 8 p.m. According to these affiliate station programers, the network told them that "M*A*S*H" could be moved back to 8:30 p.m. only if there were some assurances that the preempting of "Alice" would be minimal. A compromise was struck and

Dodge on USFL field

DETROIT—Dodge has added its name to the roster of automotive sponsors for ABC's United States Football League telecasts.

Dodge will split exclusive advertising rights on the telecasts with Buick. Each will get nine regular-season games and one playoff game. They will share sponsorship of the league championship game in July.

The original plan for sponsorship of the league called for all auto sponsors of "Monday Night Football," the ABC broadcasts of National Football League games, to become sponsors of the telecasts of the new league.

But Nissan/Datsun pulled out and went with sponsorship of the USFL on cable tv's Entertainment & Sports Programming Network. Dodge stepped in and took its place. Chevrolet will be the truck sponsor of the games on ABC (AA, Jan. 24).

Pet projects of Chrysler chairman Lee Iacocca came into the Dodge agreement. Some 30-second charitable tv spots supporting the Statue of Liberty, Ellis Island Foundation will be co-sponsored by Dodge and the USFL. Mr. Iacocca is chairman of the foundation formed to restore the land-

Part of British Air campaign ready to fly

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

Although the new corporate image part of a campaign for British Airways from Saatchi & Saatchi/Compton breaks in April, a look at the tactical side of that campaign—print ads designed to lure both business and leisure travelers—will break in the U.S. in a week.

This British Airways campaign marks the first combined creative effort for Saatchi & Saatchi/Compton (AA, Jan. 31).

Most of the U.S. budget for the tactical campaign—which last year came to about $8 million—will be invested in attracting the business traveler with product and service-oriented advertising. The print ads will use surrealistic art that provides an unusual view of an airplane seat as British Airways touts its "widest seat" in its Super Club Class (the equivalent to other airlines' business class) and speed (via the "fastest seats" on its supersonic Concorde).

Returning to four-color magazine ads for the first time since 1978, British Airways will use Business Week, Forbes, Fortune, Newsweek Executive Plus and Time. Newspaper ads also might run in BA's gateway cities. A decision on whether to use spot radio has not been reached.

When Saatchi & Saatchi pitched the British Air account, it strongly pushed the idea of an image campaign, according to Don Ford, British Airways' marketing manager (USA). Saatchi had created highly successful image campaigns for British Petroleum and Dunlop in the U.K.

The 60-second British Air image spots will feature a number of celebrities at airports as they prepare to board British Air jets. Mr. Ford has not seen the tv spots yet. Only one has been filmed and, in keeping with the sometimes mysterious ways of the agency's creative whiz, Charles Saatchi, the client is being kept in the dark about the spots' actual look. "Actually," Mr. Ford added as an afterthought, "I've never even laid my eyes on Charles Saatchi."

The only reason it is known who some of the celebrities in the new campaign are is because one of them—Joan Collins of ABC's "Dynasty"—decided to talk to the British press during the filming of one spot. She also said Tony Curtis and Omar Shariff are in the spots. Mr. Ford said the airline tried to sign golfer Jack Nicklaus, but Mr. Nicklaus sought a longer-term relationship than the airline was willing to give him. The celebrities are being paid in free British Air tickets, Mr. Ford said.

Robert Morley, the 75-year-old actor who has served as British Air's U.S. spokesman for eight years, again will appear in the U.S. image spots. Mr. Ford said Mr. Morley is not used in the U.K. campaign because British audiences are not as smitten with his commercial work as are the Americans. The BA executive noted that the same image spots will be used in the 80 countries the airline serves. This means the celebrities are recognizable worldwide.

The image campaign also will have another purpose. It will try to attract investors to buy British Airways stock.

In 1982, Mr. Ford said, British Air's worldwide advertising budget was $30 million. The 1983 budget has not been approved by the carrier's board, but Mr. Ford said it would be substantially higher than the 1982 figure. The budget for the image campaign, also not approved by the board, will be separate from the airline's worldwide budget.

Saatchi & Saatchi/Compton succeeded Foote, Cone & Belding, New York, Jan. 1.#

GF trims research

White Plains, N.Y.—General Foods is eliminating 23 marketing research positions out of a companywide total of 233 in a continuing effort to cut overhead and improve profitability.

A company spokesman said the "small reduction in marketing research personnel" has occurred "in response to strategic alterations in GF's businesses." The spokesman would not disclose the posts being eliminated, but he said they include a range of salary grades and functions.

He said the decision to make this move was generated internally and not as a result of a study that McKinsey & Co. is conducting for the company. Although some research services will continue to be handled within divisions, the company is also establishing a corporate services group that will provide marketing research to corporate and sector management, he said. Heading this new group will be John Webber, formerly director of client services. The spokesman said marketing research is the only area affected, but he said he is aware that all areas of the company are being reviewed.#

Graham heads Crain Books unit

Chicago—Jarlath J. (Jack) Graham, vp-communications and editorial development of Crain Communications Inc., will also take over as operating director of Crain Books, effective March 1.

He succeeds Rich Hagle, who has resigned to join his wife in an independent operation in the book publishing field.

Considerable expansion in the book and related fields is planned for Crain Books, which now publishes more than 50 books and self-help programs, principally in the marketing and advertising fields.

Mr. Graham previously was editor of Advertising Age, also published by Crain Communications.#

Shopping the Hispanic supermarket

From rice to tea, geographic, ethnic picks show up

By Alan B. Miller

SAMI (Selling Areas-Marketing Inc.) has begun tracking product movement for Hispanic vs. non-Hispanic segments in seven major markets that account for 70% of all U.S. Hispanics.

In order to provide this product movement data, SAMI selected a sample of supermarkets within census tracts with predominantly Hispanic populations and compared sales with the census tracts of predominantly non-Hispanic populations. In census tracts with Hispanic populations of 50% or more the average level is 70.9% Hispanic. The average number of supermarkets in the seven markets in which Hispanic vs. non-Hispanic purchases are measured is 182 per market.

Alan B. Miller Jr. is vp-sales service manager with Selling Areas-Marketing Inc., a division of Time Inc., New York.

The U.S. Hispanic population is far from homogeneous in character. Their food store buying preferences can be influenced by geographical differences but more importantly perhaps are a result of their ethnic origin. In Texas, southern California and Arizona, most of the Hispanics have emigrated to the U.S. from Mexico. In San Francisco it is said that the Hispanic population tends to be second and third generation U.S. natives rather than recent arrivals from south of the border. The vast majority of the Hispanics in Miami is of Cuban origin, whereas the most prevalent port of exodus among Hispanics in the metropolitan New York area is Puerto Rico.

In order to assess the prevalence of both similarities and differences in purchasing idiosyncrasies of Hispanics vs. non-Hispanics on a market-by-market basis, SAMI has selected certain key product categories and, for the year ending Oct. 15, 1982, has indexed sales among shoppers in stores in predominantly Hispanic census tracts against 52-week volume in non-Hispanic areas. Category indices are arrived at by determining the sales per million dollars all commodity volume (ACV) for the category among Hispanic shoppers compared with non-Hispanic shoppers.

It would be dangerous to treat Hispanics as a stereotyped (marketing) population segment.

As an example, in the catsup category, the index of spending per million dollars of food store expenditures among Hispanics in the Phoenix/Tucson market is 118. This means that the expenditure among Hispanics for catsup is 18% higher per million dollars spent than is found in this market as a whole. In the New York market, catsup purchases among Hispanics has an index level of 90, or 10% below expenditures per million dollars among shoppers in all of the supermarkets in the panel combined.

On a category purchase basis, there are instances where Hispanic supermarket expenditures follow a constant pattern, either high or low, from one market to another. In the case of dried rice the expenditure per million dollars ACV among Hispanics is higher than the non-Hispanic level in all seven SAMI markets ranging from a high of 188 in Miami to a low of 110 in San Antonio/Corpus Christi.

In the tea bag category, the Hispanic index is lower than the non-Hispanic level with parameters of 92 for a high in El Paso to 64 in the case of New York. A product category with a wide range of variation from one market to another is wet dog food. Here the expenditure level per million ACV is high in Miami (147), El Paso (127), Phoenix (126) and Los Angeles (115), but lower than the average of the entire store sample in New York (61), San Francisco (68) and San Antonio/Corpus Christi (89).

In the accompanying table, which shows 52-week indices of Hispanic purchases of selected product classes, the index is based upon the share of total category dollar volume in the ethnic panel stores vs. shares in the nonethnic panel stores in each of the seven markets. At this level, here again we detect instances where Hispanic shares are universally high as in "short goods" pasta, consistently low as with decaffeinated ground coffee or a mixture of strengths and weaknesses as is seen with the fruit punch flavor of single strength juice drinks.

The market-by-market flavor preference differences among Hispanics as compared with non-Hispanics in the same markets, is especially interesting. In Miami the highest flavor class index for single strength juice drinks is cranberry with a share index of 116. In San Francisco, Los Angeles, Phoenix and San Antonio, orange is the high-ranking flavor.

Among tea bags, Hispanics in El Paso and Miami opt for herbal infusion items compared with their non-Hispanic counterparts, while black-tea bags get the nod in Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Frozen chicken dish entrees are popular with Hispanics in all seven SAMI Hispanic markets ranging from a share index of 231 in Phoenix/Tucson to a relative low of 132 in Miami. Looking at the all-meat class of canned dog food (vs. maintenance) the Hispanic index to non-Hispanic in Phoenix is only 67.

However, in New York the all-meat (also premium priced) index is 106. On the other hand, the index for premium margarine among Hispanics in the New York market is only 67, compared with 133 in the San Antonio-Corpus Christi market.

Looking at the processed cheese category we find that individually wrapped slices have a higher share among Hispanics in six out of seven markets. Only in El Paso is the relative strength higher for regular wrap slices.

In the case of air fresheners, aerosols fare better from a share standpoint among Hispanics in six out of seven SAMI markets (data is not available in El Paso) than do solid air fresheners.

When Hispanic shares are studied on a brand-by-brand and market-by-market basis, there are also important similarities as well as variations noted. The study shows there are great differences when the brand level is reached.

There is no common denominator among Hispanics. They react differently in different markets to different brands.

Behaviorists may have logical explanations for some of these peaks and valleys in Hispanic consumption levels. Some weaknesses may be correctable through special advertising or promotional activities. Other preferences may be ingrained as part of an ethnic heritage. But it does appear from an assessment of these numbers that it would be dangerous from a marketing standpoint to treat Hispanics as a stereotyped segment of the population. Buying habits must be determined on a market-by-market basis. ■

CBS debates return to fold on guarantees

By CRAIG REISS

New York—CBS-TV Network, which during last year's upfront selling season took the bold and controversial stance of dropping audience demographic guarantees for advertisers, now is debating internally whether to give back the guarantees on certain types of nonprime time programing.

NBC has announced it will continue providing demographic guarantees in upfront sales, while ABC still is considering the issue. Sources at ABC, however, say it is leaning toward maintaining the guarantees.

These developments mark a dramatic turnaround from only a few months ago, when buyers and network sellers alike presumed the guarantees would be dropped by all three networks as a matter of course. Agency and tv sources attribute the change in network strategies to three primary factors.

First, they say, an exceptionally soft scatter-sales market in the fourth quarter of 1982 left the CBS strategy vulnerable to the whims of the marketplace. Next, NBC this year has attracted a younger and more urban audience, which allows that network to meet more easily the demographic performances covered in the guarantees. Third, ABC, which traditionally performs well in the most desired demographic categories, would be taking an unnecessary risk by dropping the guarantees.

The most significant development, however, is the apparent softening of the CBS position. If CBS gives back any guarantees, the other two networks virtually would be forced to continue their own demographic guarantees.

Jerry Dominus, vp-sales at CBS, said the network would continue to provide only total audience guarantees for prime time programing, but the possibility exists for providing demographic delivery guarantees next fall on broadcasts of National Football League games. The debate inside CBS still is being waged, Mr. Dominus said, and no final policy has been set.

Time eyes women's book

By STUART J. ELLIOTT

New York—Is Time Inc. thinking again about a women's magazine?

According to reports, the communications giant is considering development of a magazine aimed at a female readership. Some speculation indicates the company is interested in a magazine for the executive and business woman, rather than a traditional women's service publication.

Time Inc. tried its hand at the matter in 1976-77, with Woman, a pocket-size weekly for what was dubbed "the changing American woman."

The results of a 12-city test in November, 1977, were described in terms ranging from "disappointing" to "a disaster," and the idea was shelved soon after.

Frank Lalli, deputy director-magazine development, told Advertising Age that whatever Time Inc. is working on, "it is not a revival of the 1976 project. We are not in any way reviving. . .[that] project."

Time Inc. is looking at six or seven ideas, Mr. Lalli said, a couple of which are "products that may have some mix of women readers." Asked if one is a magazine aimed at the business-executive woman, he demurred. "We look at a lot of things," he said. "We've made progress in a number of fields. This conversation is a little premature."

Fueling the tantalizing talk of a women's magazine is the presence of Judith Daniels, the founder of Savvy, who joined Time Inc. last year in a post she described as "a kind of roving senior editorship." She was to spend four months at Money, followed by a stint at People, and then join the company's Tv commercials in Germany for Blendax Anti-Belag (against plaque) toothpaste show a father illustrating for his child how the product works. Such a product would require FDA approval for U.S. marketing.

Its German toothpastes are plaque-fighters

Blendax may enter U.S.

By DAGMAR MUSSEY

The huge German toothpaste marketer, Blendax Werke R. Schneider, is making plans to bring a plaque-preventing toothpaste to the U.S., according to sources.

The private company, which is based in Mainz and had sales of about $210 million last year, would have to apply for Food & Drug Administration approval of its ingredient that fights plaque.

The new chief executive officer of Blendax, Wulf Horstkotte, refused to confirm or deny the reports. But he said that bringing a plaque-preventing toothpaste to the U.S. "would not be out of the question."

The company has selected an advertising agency in the U.S., sources say.

Neither competitors nor the company's German ad agency for toothpastes, Team/BBDO subsidiary Imparc, have heard anything about a U.S. move.

Blendax could bring either one of two toothpastes from Germany, or a brand-new product. Blendax holds 38% of the German dentifrice market with Anti-Belag, a toothpaste billed as plaque-preventing and introduced in 1975; Blend-A-Med, an antiperiodontal-disease toothpaste; Blendi, a brand for children, and several other toothpastes that do not get ad support.

Both Blend-A-Med and Anti-Belag contain the same ingredient: Sodium monofluorophosphate. The marketer needs FDA approval because the agency must approve any formula or package claims tying plaque

K-C fires first shot at P&G's Always test

By JENNIFER ALTER

In what is sure to be only the first in a series of maneuvers by feminine hygiene product marketers to protect their turf from Procter & Gamble, Kimberly-Clark is introducing a New Freedom "thin" maxipad into test market in Minneapolis/St. Paul.

The fact that Minneapolis/St. Paul is the market selected by P&G to test its new Always line of feminine protection products (AA, Feb. 7) is no coincidence.

According to a K-C spokesman, "It [Minneapolis] would have been one of the markets we'd have considered, but it probably would not ultimately have been chosen had not P&G selected it." The company said its new product has been in development "for some time," but that the Always introduction set for April "accelerated our move." Going into Minneapolis/St. Paul "gives us an opportunity to test our full line of products in a market where everything is going on."

- After seeing the Kimberly presentation of its test plans, a retailer had a slightly different impression of the move, and of its announcement that it would begin discounting current New Freedom products to the trade even though they had just come off deal. "They want to send a message to P&G that it's going to cost them a lot of money to get into this market," he said.

To be shipped beginning Feb. 28, New Freedom thin pads are less than one-half the size of regular pads and do not contain superabsorbent materials, the company said. Billed as "a patented breakthrough in menstrual protection," the pad is designed to draw fluid into its inner core, where it is trapped and dispersed through the length of the pad, thus doing the job of a larger pad without the bulk. It comes in unscented and deodorant forms in boxes of 12 and 30.

In sales presentations obviously geared to focus on what K-C perceives as a weakness in the P&G line, salesmen are pointing out that the growth of the thin segment has outpaced that of other pads—and will continue to do so.

The Always line consists of maxipads, minipads and pantiliners, but there is no "thin" product. The major competitors in the segment currently are Johnson & Johnson, with Sure & Natural, and Tampax with its Maxithins. According to K-C, consumer tests "against competing products" ranked the New Freedom product "tops in every cate-

Spot tv in new domestic markets gets emphasis

Pan Am cuts ads, exits net tv

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

New York—Pan American World Airways will trim its worldwide advertising budget by $3.5 million this year, and has dropped network tv from its media plan.

Armand Arel, director of passenger advertising at Pan Am, said the carrier's 1982 worldwide ad budget was $72 million. For '83, he said, it is $68.5 million.

The decision to stop network tv advertising, the executive said, fit in with the struggling airline's strategy to use spot tv in new local markets in which it intends to open service. "We intend to become more local-oriented," Mr. Arel said. "We will pay more attention to local markets and be more aggressive in a retail sense."

Pan Am last week began service to and from Minneapolis. Mr. Arel said it will be expanding service from Chicago to San Francisco and on to the Orient. "These types of things cannot be handled by network advertising at the moment," he said.

Mr. Arel noted that the bulk of Pan Am's budget will be spent in newspapers. He added that ads seeking business and leisure-class flyers will run in upscale magazines such as Texas Monthly and Southern Living. He said negotiations with other magazines were

Vicks near rollout of Lifestage

By PAT SLOAN

Richardson-Vicks appears to be readying a broad launch of Lifestage vitamins, testing in Marion, Ind., for the past year.

Although the brand has not been presented to the trade nationally, there are indications the company is looking to roll out the brand sometime around May.

A Richardson-Vicks spokesman acknowledged, "Our people are making prelaunch visits to six to eight of the larger factors in the trade to check the appeal of the brand, and the program that will be used for the launch."

He added, "In all probability the launch will be relatively soon. But the date has not been decided."

Additionally, Richardson-Vicks has moved Lifestage out of Shaller Rubin Associates, agency of record for new-product development, and assigned it to Benton & Bowles.

Richardson-Vicks already sells Plus vitamins through healthfood stores. Lifestage, a five-product line, is aimed at drugstores and supermarkets. Targeted

Coors readies Golden Lager brand

By ROBERT REED

Adolph Coors Co. has chosen the name Golden Lager 1873 for its new full-bodied beer being prepared for test marketing (AA, Jan. 24).

Still to be determined is if Golden Lager is the only name being considered for the brew, which industry sources expect will be introduced during the spring in parts of the Southeast and in some of the brewer's western strongholds. Coors officials refused to comment on the brew or confirm that a heavier-tasting product is in the wings.

The Golden Lager label features a ram's head against a gold-and-red backdrop. The label's inscription touts the brew as having a "full-bodied taste" from "ingredients with over a century of brewing." The ad theme is, "a whole 'nother breed of beer." Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, handles.

Coors is attempting to give its new beer added credibility by linking it with the past. The date 1873 is a reference to the founding of the brewery in Golden, Colo., by Adolph Coors and Jacob Schueler.

Golden Lager is expected to be premium-price. With that positioning and heavier taste, it will be locking horns with the likes of Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser and Miller High Life.

Coors has been expanding into the Southeast this year, and also is making inquiries to distributors in the upper Northwest.

In recent years, the lighter-tasting Coors Premium has been losing market share in Texas and California. Boasting an estimated 40% share in these states during the 1970s, the company's share has been whittled down to about half that. In comparison, A-B has garnered an estimated 48% share in California. Miller has tallied an estimated 27% share in Texas, while A-B has about 26%, according to Manny Goldman, analyst for Montgomery Securities, San Francisco.

In other industry news, Pabst Brewing Co. and West Germany's Furstlich Furstenbergische Brauerei have terminated their import agreement. The German brewer has established a wholly owned subsidiary in the U.S.

The Milwaukee brewer no longer will distribute Furstenberg Beir and instead will concentrate on turning around its own brands, according to the company.

Based out of Gaithersburg, Md., Furstenberg will attempt to go it alone in the imported beer market.#

NOW, SELECT & SAVE CAN BUILD YOUR FRANCHISE BY CHANGING CONSUMERS' BUYING HABITS.

No more grouping consumers by broad parameters. No predetermining shopping habits. We created Select & Save, the computer-targeted variable value couponing program, to prequalify consumers and determine their specific buying habits.

This is accomplished by consumer response to a customized questionnaire delivered through 42,000,000+ FSI's covering 50% of U.S. households.

You determine the coupon values for your brand based on specific individual household information, such as:

- Category usage
- Brand preference
- Demographic Selectors:
  - Age
  - Family Size
  - Number, Sex & Age of Children
  - Type of Dwelling
  - Geographic Location
- Custom Discriminators
  - Volume of Consumption
  - Length of Purchase Cycle
  - Number of Users in the Household
  - Multiple Brand Users
  - Special Usage Information (i.e., pet food-size of dog, number of cats)

Ent. Channel to go under?

By SUSAN SPILLMAN

NEW YORK—The Entertainment Channel, a joint pay t venture of RCA Corp. an Rockefeller Center TV that ha been struggling to gain subscribers since its debut eigh months ago, is said to be on the verge of folding.

Industry sources report tha official word of a shutdown could come as early as next month, making it the second national cable network to go out of business. CBS Cable was the first to pull the plug on its subscribers in December. Executives of The Entertainment company refused to confirm or deny these persistent reports.

Entertainment Channel, headed by former CBS chief Arthur Taylor, has long had its share of industry skeptics. From the onset, the network faced a tough marketing challenge as it tried, for the first time, to get viewers to pay $12 per month for programing other than movies, sports or exclusively cultural fare.

Instead, calling itself a "broad but not mass-appeal network," it has sought to appeal to the 10% of all basic cable subscribers it claimed were dissatisfied with commercial network programing. The channel has about 45,000 subscribers and is available in 67 cable systems.

If the network folds, its losses could be well into the millions of dollars. Acknowledging high disconnect problems, the channel this month said it would revamp its programing and marketing at a reported cost of $8 million to $10 million.#

'Triathlon' takes its first big step

By RUTH STROUD

Los Angeles—Marathons are passe. The new sports challenge of the '80s will be the triathlon, the tough endurance sport that combines three events, usually swimming, bicycling and running, into one race. That's the conclusion of the publishers of a new national quarterly magazine called Triath-

The magazine, which has a slick, four-color, offset format, is the second sports publication for Swim Swim, which produced its first magazine, Swim Swim, a quarterly for fitness swimmers, four years ago. Swim Swim was started as just a "goofy idea" by three friends with no money, according to co-founder and creative director Harald Johnson. He expected that nership and far better financed by a group of triathlon enthusiasts, will overshadow its 15,000-circulation sibling.

Distribution of Triathlon's initial issue will be 50,000 copies by subscription and through running, swimming, cycling and sporting goods shops nationwide. Aided by the sport's burgeoning popularity, that figure will double by the

Mr. Johnson supports his contention with some figures. More than 60,000 athletes participated in 250 triathlons nationally in 1982, while, between May and October of this year, 75,000 to 100,000 people are expected to press their muscles to the limit in more than 300 events.

The first issue begins auspiciously with a 50-50 advertising-to-editorial ratio, according to Mr. Johnson. Advertisers, who pay one-time, one-page rates of $1,700 for b&w and $2,300 for four-color, running specialists, as well as clothing, beer and exercise equipment.#

Knight-Ridder reports 7% climb in revenues

New products to pace food rebound

No treaty in battle of burgers

St. Petersburg Beach, Fla.—Last fall's battle of the burgers may have been only the first strike in what could be a continuing war between the chains.

Pillsbury president Winston Wallin told food analysts at last week's conference they "no doubt will hear more" about broiling versus frying hamburgers "in the months to come." Mr. Wallin referred to the company's three-month Burger King ad campaign (via J. Walter Thompson USA), which took on McDonald's Big Mac and Wendy's hamburgers in comparative spots that proclaimed Burger King's Whopper a national taste-test winner. Suits filed by both competitors were settled out of court after Pillsbury apparently agreed to pull the spots by yearend.

"We had a cessation of the hostilities last December, but come spring, who knows?" Mr. Wallin said. While he refused to clarify the company's intent, he noted later that Pillsbury has "no agreement not to enter" into future comparative campaigns under the

Kellogg tells new strategy

St. Petersburg Beach, Fla.—Kellogg Co. will attack both current creative work and media mix to try to bring its 38% share of the $3.2 billion ready-to-eat cereal market back to its earlier 40% mark.

Gerald Robinson, recently named president of Kellogg's U.S. food products division, and company chairman William E. LaMothe told analysts at the Consumer Analysts Group of New York conference here that Kellogg will be looking for more effective ways to reach consumers, particularly through more local advertising and promotion.

Advertising, the two executives emphasized, will be a major tool in regaining market share lost in large part to private-label and generic brands in the last two years.

Mr. LaMothe did not specify increases in the fiscal 1983 ad budget, saying only that Kellogg's marketing funds have risen 15% to 20% in the last five years. But, he added, "It's a question of mix and whether [those funds are] being used effectively."

Mr. Robinson noted that because of the deterioration of network tv audience, and the increased cost of tv time, it now "costs nearly two-thirds more to do less."

Kellogg will "treat each market more specifically, rather than [pursuing] national marketing programs," he told Advertising Age.

Mr. Robinson implied there will be changes in creative strategy as well, telling AA: "Somehow, when the market doesn't grow, we're not presenting the right new product or not doing enough advertising, or our creative messages are not strong enough to influence consumer purchases." Kellogg recently as-

St. Petersburg Beach, Fla.—Food and grocery marketers are returning to a new-product growth course that will rely heavily on extending brand franchises, following a year in which highly successful new-product entries dropped to about half their 1978 level.

Speaking to the Consumer Analysts Group of New York here last week, marketers from a number of major food companies indicated they are looking for new-product introductions based on current brand names to pave their growth patterns over the next one to five years. They also hope that new "value-added" products can increase volume this year in a continuing competitive environment.

Figures reported by Selling Areas Marketing Inc., which measures product movement, supported a recurrent theme that marketers held back on introducing new items last year. SAMI figures indicated a dramatic decline as the number of new million-dollar grocery brands introduced last year reached a five-year low of 58, in contrast to almost double that in 1978 and down from 86 in 1981.

Most executives from the 15 major food and beverage producers who made presentations at the analysts group's winter meeting here expressed cautious optimism about the coming year, but many emphasized they are not banking on a brighter economic picture to improve their businesses.

Said Philip L. Smith, president, General Foods, "I spent all last year waiting for the economy to improve, and I'll be damned if I'm going to do that again. If it happens, then we'll do even better than planned."

While they talked about tighter controls, they also plan increased ad budgets. Many of the increases will be about 10%.

Several executives, such as Campbell Soup's George McGovern and CPC International's Richard Siebrasse, emphasized that they are in the food business for the long haul and are trying to hold back on indiscriminate discounting that can "ruin good brands," in the words of Mr. Siebrasse.

P&G starts test of Ivory shampoo, conditioner

Cincinnati—Procter & Gamble is introducing Ivory shampoo and a companion conditioner into test in western Michigan in 16-oz. normal, oily and dry forms. The company continues to test an earlier version of Ivory shampoo in St. Louis and Burlington, Vt. (AA, Aug. 11, '80). The newer entry, in a round bottle, is opaque pearlescent instead of blue, and it no longer contains a conditioner. The company also has expanded distribution of Liquid Ivory soap (AA, Oct. 11) into portions of Colorado, Utah and New Mexico. It continues to test that brand in the BehaviorScan markets of Eau Claire, Wis., and Pittsfield, Mass. Benton & Bowles handles the shampoo and conditioner; Compton is the agency on the liquid soap.

Washington Post buys into regional pay tv units

Washington—Washington Post Co. plans to enter pay tv by purchasing partnership interests in SportsChannel Associates, New York, and New England SportsChannel, Boston. Both provide local and regional sports programing, which Post Co. president Richard Simmons said has "exceptional potential for profit growth." A company spokesman said it also is "examining other markets for sports programing opportunities." The

Got to be big, Turner says of merger search

By MAURINE CHRISTOPHER

Sports and cable entrepreneur Ted Turner late last week said growing concentration in the tv cable-entertainment industry led to his search for corporate merger or co-venture partners for Turner Broadcasting System.

Mr. Turner said he wasn't discouraged by the fact that neither ABC, CBS nor NBC has shown any signs of immediate interest in teaming up with one of their most caustic critics. His superstation WTBS and Cable News Network are among the most successful cable programing operations, but sources at tv's Big 3 reacted coolly to the idea of a TBS merger if Mr. Turner, as a major stockholder, director and officer, was to be included in the package. However, a CBS spokesman said CBS was "in a listening mood."

Mr. Turner, who also reportedly has had conversations about joint-venturing with Gannett Co. and who is likely to talk to still other companies, said he has been mainly discussing philosophy so far. "You don't work out a major deal like this in one exploratory meeting," he asserted in a phone interview from Atlanta.

The man who has always preferred to ride the corporate range alone said he decided to look for mutually attractive tie-ins with entertainment and communications giants because the corporate

Cologne—Miele & Cie has tapped Doyle Dane Bernbach, Duesseldorf, to handle its $5 million-plus German account. Europe's largest home appliance marketer pulled out of McCann-Erickson last month after rejecting McCann's single Europewide campaign (AA, Jan. 24).

Sao Paulo—Sears, Roebuck & Co. may be selling its Brazilian operation, the company's largest foreign holding. One rumored potential buyer is a consortium of two major Brazilian department store chains and an unnamed U.S. chain.

Melbourne—JWT Group subsidiary Begg Dow Priday, still under police investigation for alleged kickbacks paid to one client to win an account (AA, Dec. 6), has won the $1.5 million Victorian Egg Board account, following its loss last December of the $2 million-plus Australian Dairy Board account.

Geneva—A motion to restrict cigaret and alcohol advertising will be on the agenda of the World Health Organization's annual meeting in May, following a report to WHO that advertising is making smoking and drinking too attractive.

Paris—Braun, the German appliance marketer, has named Dupuy-Compton to develop its first pan-European campaign for Braun electric razors. The account, worth $2 million in France alone, was formerly with Grey.

Beijing—China Daily, the only national English-language paper in the People's Republic of China, has appointed the Colin Turner Group in London as its first European ad rep.

Taylor will seek ads for Entertainment net

By SUSAN SPILLMAN

New York—RCA and Rockefeller Center TV's decision last week to fold their struggling Entertainment Channel pay tv network came as little surprise to the cable industry (AA, Feb. 21). What did come as a surprise and still is baffling both cable and advertising executives is the company's announced intention to resurrect the channel as an advertiser-supported cable service by summer.

The 9-month-old network, which featured British Broadcasting Corp. series and Broadway plays, lost $34 million before taxes for its owners.

When the service pulls the plug on its 45,000 subscribers March 31, it will become the second major cable operation to go under in the last six months. CBS Cable was the first, losing more than $30 million for CBS Inc.

Arthur R. Taylor, chairman of the channel, blamed the network's failure on a poor economy that he said discouraged consumers from paying $8 to $12 a month for the service and cable operators from upgrading their systems in order to carry it.

The same poor economy, however, also has bruised more than two dozen ad-supported cable networks that lost an estimated $250 million last year. Ironically, when CBS Cable was on the brink of collapse, its management considered a switch from advertiser to subscriber support as a last-ditch rescue effort.

A born-again version of Entertainment Channel is being evaluated but has not received a go-ahead from either parent. Yet Mr Taylor, a former CBS Inc. president, is confident that with the same name and only a few programing changes the service can attract advertiser support and succeed.

"There is a bright outlook for advertiser spending in 1983, and I expect some of it to spill over into cable," he said. Mr. Taylor does not hold the same optimism for future pay tv networks. That market has changed and now is being dominated by two giants, he said, referring to the recent combine of Movie Channel and Showtime and the studio affiliations of mammoth

CBS: Not changing policy

By CRAIG REISS

New York—CBS Broadcast Group exec vp James Rosenfield said the tv network will not change its position on audience demographic guarantees for any daypart. He added that the debate at CBS over next season's National Football League broadcasts involves whether to provide advertisers with total household delivery guarantees and does not relate to any specific demographic guarantees.

"Daytime television has always been sold against ratings for women viewers and has never been sold against total household ratings," Mr. Rosenfield said. "The issue of demographic guarantees is not pertinent to daytime."

On the issue of advertiser demands for guarantees on next season's professional football games, Mr. Rosenfield said, "We are dealing with a specific marketing problem in pro football, on how well the audience will come back to football following the strike year. In the sports area, we may have to give guarantees on total homes. We have never had demographic guarantees on sports, and there has been no internal debate at CBS on that."

Mr. Rosenfield was responding to a Feb. 21 Advertising Age article that said CBS was considering whether to give demographic guarantees on NFL coverage next season. The article also reported ad agency speculation that demographic guarantees in other dayparts could be granted this year by CBS as part of package buys that cover several dayparts.

"CBS last year dropped demographic guarantees in prime time only," Mr. Rosenfield said. "Sports and other dayparts were never affected."

During last year's network upfront selling season, CBS broke ranks with its competitor networks and eliminated guarantees for audience deliveries in specific demographic categories for prime time programing. Mr. Rosenfield said other dayparts always have been sold against total audience delivery guarantees, and that policy is still in effect at CBS. Since daytime tv and sports attract audiences that are predominantly female and male, respectively, advertisers could make logical projections on demographic deliveries based on total audience results.

For this reason, demographic guarantees for these dayparts are unnecessary, and advertising is sold

Borden products go light

By GAY JERVEY

In an effort to woo health, self and diet-conscious Americans, Borden Inc. is introducing a number of decidedly "less is more" products, among them a line of Wyler's sugar-free powdered drink beverages that will go head-to-head with General Food's sugar-free Kool-Aid. Both are sweetened with aspartame.

Borden also is bringing forth Wise Lite-Line snacks that, the company boasts, contain "one-third less fat and fewer calories" than the more wicked state-of-the-art munchies; Lite-Line low-cholesterol, Lite-Line Sodium-Lite and Lite-Line reduced-sodium cheese products, and Lite-Line low-sodium instant bouillon in beef and chicken flavors.

Borden is terming its onslaught against Kool-Aid as the biggest in Wyler's history, and one that will be backed by unprecedented ad spending.

From April through September, Borden will be spending at an annual rate of $18 million, a sharply higher spending level than last year's outlay. For the first nine

Account-switching volume drops in '82

By NANCY MILLMAN

The volume of advertising business changing hands in 1982 dropped 6% to $1.3 billion, from $1.4 billion in 1981, while total U.S. agency volume climbed to $27.7 billion in billings from $24.4 billion. That brings the total volume of accounts changing agencies to 4.7% of agency volume, from 6% last year.

These figures are based on a compilation of U.S. account changes $500,000 and above reported in ADVERTISING AGE.

The biggest account change of the year was Chrysler Corp.'s Dodge car and truck account—at $100 million—which switched to BBDO from Kenyon & Eckhardt. BBDO had held the account for 38 years before losing it to K&E in 1979.

The total Chrysler advertising business at K&E had grown to $250 million since that time, however, and company chairman Lee Iacocca decided it was time to split the business up again.

The most active category, for the second year in a row, was travel and tourism, with $181.85 million in account changes. And in this category, one company, Continental Airlines, changed agencies twice within the year.

As was the case in 1981, it was financial turbulence in the airline industry that motivated decisions to change advertising counsel. But in the case of the $35 million Pan American World Airways account, it seemed that friendship was the factor that clinched the roosting place.

Doyle Dane Bernbach was only seven months into the job when Wells, Rich, Greene made a pitch to new Pan Am chief Edward Acker. He had worked under Harding Lawrence while at Braniff, which Mr. Lawrence then ran. And Mr. Lawrence is married to WRG chief executive officer Mary Wells Lawrence. DDB management apparently was stunned at the swiftness of the move to WRG in January.

But the acquisition of Pan Am made WRG an

Spec presentations alive, well and maligned

Last year's largest advertising account change—the Dodge business, billing about $100 million a year—went from Kenyon & Eckhardt to BBDO with the respect and intelligence agencies say they deserve.

That is, the client didn't require the agencies seeking the business to prepare the ads they would prepare if they really had the account. Speculative presentations. Rare indeed is the agency that has anything good to say about the practice.

Alas, the Dodge account (which was at BBDO once before) proved to be pretty much of an exception. For the most part last year, agencies trying to land important accounts had to jump through hoops as obediently as ever to do so: The much-maligned "spec" presentation is alive and well in the ad business.

American Bell, Hallmark Cards, Budweiser Light, 7UP, Sears corporate merchandising and Sears apparel—indeed, an apparent majority of the year's largest, most coveted accounts were granted only after a presentation of speculative creative work. Invariably, that meant night and weekend work, tight deadlines, frayed nerves, financial outlays insufficiently or not at all reimbursed and almost always—certainly in the minds of losing agencies—a feeling that the process is unfair and that there really ought to be a better way.

"I think they are damn stupid," said Hank Gerfen, president of Mathieu, Gerfen & Bresner, New York, echoing an oft-voiced agency opinion. "You don't ask a lawyer to look at a case for you to see what he can do. I think we as an industry tend not to think of ourselves professionally enough."

"None of us like to do it," Graham Phillips, exec vp-managing director, Ogilvy & Mather, said after his shop won the new $30 million American Bell account last November over N W Ayer, Ketchum Communications and Campbell-Ewald. "We would like to think we could be awarded business on our reputation and past performance."

Nobody keeps track of exactly how many creative shootouts—as competitive spec presentations are also known—are staged each year, but the number seems to be growing.

"There has been a lot of competition over the past two years for big accounts," Mr. Phillips noted. And he said agencies can expect to see more creative shootouts conducted by major advertisers.

One reason may be the bad economy, which causes some advertisers to reduce

Ads don't buy votes in Chicago

By JENNIFER ALTER

CHICAGO—Despite an enormous amount f attention, energy and money focused on olitical media campaigns during this city's Democratic mayoral primary race, the candidate with the least money to spend on advertising won the nomination.

The surprise victor, U.S. Rep. Harold Vashington, began his tv advertising campaign only two weeks before the election. Mr. Washington, a black candidate, had rouble raising money, and so he spent only 130,000 on paid media.

In comparison, incumbent Mayor Jane 1. Byrne had been advertising since Thanksgiving. Her media adviser, new image" and some of the claims she made in er commercials proved extremely controversial, and she spent more than $1.6 milion on tv. A third candidate, State's Attorney Richard M. Daley, son of the late Mayor Richard J. Daley, began his tv campaign in early January and spent more han $900,000.

Mr. Washington will face Republican awyer Bernard Epton in a general election April 12.

During most of the campaign, Mr. Daley nd Mrs. Byrne addressed themselves to ne another and did not pay much attention to Mr. Washington. Indeed, when sked for a prediction several weeks before he Feb. 22 primary, Raymond Strother, Mr. Daley's Washington-based media consultant, would not name a winner but did xpress certainty that Mr. Washington vould be last.

Monopoly name doesn't pass Go

By RICHARD L. GORDON

WASHINGTON—Wary of self-fulfilling prophecies, Parker Brothers' sympathizers in the business community are reluctant to spread gloom and doom among marketers because "Monopoly" has joined the ranks of trademarks ruled "generic" by the courts.

The relative calm after the refusal by the Supreme Court to review the "Monopoly" case contrasts with the predecision legal rhetoric of Parker Brothers and parent General Mills. They had argued the unanimous lower court decision in the case, by the U.S. circuit court of appeals in San Francisco, makes it too easy to attack trademarks and threatens to open the door to widespread trademark "piracy."

"Do you go paranoid?" asked Robin Wolfe, executive director of the United States Trademark Assn., last week. "I don't know. I would hope that good, sound [trademark maintenance] programs will be sufficient." Meanwhile, she noted, the San Francisco decision is not binding nationally. "I hope that other courts will recognize it as a bad case."

That doesn't mean trademark holders aren't facing more uncertain times. The ramifications could be extremely bad, Ms. Wolfe said. "But I hate to scream out gloom and doom about this. Nobody knows what it means."

USA spots urge viewers to switch

By SUSAN SPILLMAN

Broadcast tv stations in 26 markets, including New York, Houston and Pittsburgh, will begin carrying commercials for USA Cable Network this week, encouraging their viewers to switch from those stations to daytime offerings on USA.

The 60-second spot shows a bored woman flipping the dial on her tv set. An off-camera voice calls her "the lost viewer searching for something different on daytime tv," who then discovers USA Cable Network. At the moment of discovery, a circus of characters from the 24-hour service bursts into her living room and begins having a party. Created by Marsteller Inc., the spots are scheduled to air on the very daytime shows from which USA Cable hopes to woo viewers. According to Andrew Besch, USA Cable director of marketing, "Some stations did turn down the spots, but we cleared 80% of the stations we wanted."

Mr. Besch declined to name those rejecting the competitive USA spots. The stations that will carry the spots for the next two weeks, however, include all three network-owned stations in New York and various network-affiliated stations in Miami, San Diego and Orlando, in addition to the markets previously mentioned.

Several broadcast stations have carried cable tv ads in recent years but never before have they aired Harder-hitting radio spots, which call traditional tv's game shows and soap operas boring, will drive home USA's pitch in each market. Radio spots only—no tv—will air in Los Angeles and Chicago.

The push for its daytime programing is part of a nearly $5 million total awareness-building campaign from USA. The service will pour nearly half of its advertising budget into spot tv. The remainder will go to radio, cable and magazines. The first wave of advertising begins this week. USA will spend another $4.5 million on program guides and affiliate co-op and incentive packages.

Big sponsor names also joining new football league. . .Page 68.

The other major emphasis in the network's first advertising will be aimed at increasing viewership for its weeknight sports. In the same markets, USA will promote its basketball and hockey coverage with tv and radio spots.

Using the slogan, "Weekend sports every weeknight," the tv commercial will air during newscasts and weekend sports events on the broadcast stations. The spot shows a group of sports fans watching tv sports in a bar. An announcer tells viewers which sport can be seen each evening on USA.

Print advertising also will promote USA's children's and late-corporate closeUp

Magic Pan cooks up plan to shed 'old-lady' image

By JENNIFER PENDLETON

Jimmy Dunlap, a 29-year-old, self-employed pasteup artist from Torrance, Cal., is not what Magic Pan International had in mind when it went into business 17 years ago: He's a blue-collar, burgers and beer kind of guy.

In fact, most Fridays he can be found at Critter's, a Hermosa Beach bar whose special that day is a bulky beef sandwich for under $2. For him, there isn't much appeal in a restaurant specializing in creamy French cuisine, albeit an Americanized version. "It just doesn't cater to my stomach," says he of the 88-location creperie.

In the past, San Francisco-based Magic Pan probably wouldn't have paid much attention to Mr. Dunlap's opinion. But times change. Today, Magic Pan, which has been losing money since 1979, is taking steps to attract the Jimmy Dunlaps of the world.

In moves designed to increase the chain's appeal to a wider range of customers, Magic Pan is broadening its menu beyond crepes and changing its decor. And in some cases, in locations the company has determined are without hope, Magic Pan is introducing entirely new concepts it believes are better suited to the tastes of the mass public.

It's all part of Magic Pan's plan to turn itself around. No longer part of Quaker Oats Co., the restaurant company's new management has come up with a five-year revitalization plan that it believes will help it become a $130 million-to-$135 million operation by 1988. Perhaps as soon as within 10 months it hopes to start expanding again, opening new, freestanding Magic Pans in desirable upper-middle income communities.

At present, management's first priority is to correct the problems that have kept Magic Pan from turning a profit for four years. This year, it is concentrating its efforts on the menu and design changes, and the tests of the new restaurant concepts. For the fiscal year ending June 30, it expects to have sales of $77 million, not a substantial improvement over last year's performance, but a level management sees as a low point from which Magic Pan can rise to recovery.

"There are just two words around here," says Tim Ryan, the 42-year-old senior vp who took over as Magic Pan's chief operating officer a month ago, "and they are, 'results now.' "

There must have been a similar sense of urgency when Mr. Ryan joined Magic Pan about two years ago. At that time, the company—still under Quaker's ownership—was watching its customer traffic decline at an annual 10% to 12% rate and was, by most accounts, at a loss as to how to arrest the trend.

At that time, Magic Pan hired Bath, O.-based Babcock & Schmid, a design and marketing consultancy, to take a hard look at its business. What Babcock & Schmid found in its 1980 study was that Magic Pan's primarily crepe menu, its French country inn-inspired decor and primarily shopping mall locations excluded large segments of its potential market.

"With the exception of ladies who liked crepes served in a French atmosphere in a shopping mall, there was no reason to go in there," says Babcock & Schmid principal Bill Babcock. Sources say it was around that time tha Quaker decided to unload Magi Pan.

What's been happening at Magi Pan during the past few years is a long way from the restaurant company's heydays of the late 1960s and early 1970s. Then crepes were the culinary rage and Wall Stree analysts pointed to Magic Pan as a restaurant chain with big growt potential. Quaker bought it in 1969.

Last summer, the Chicago-based marketer sold Magic Pan to Ba Bottlers Ltd., a family-owned Ba Area bottling company. Ba

Diet Coke ad awareness doubles

By JOSEPH M. WINSKI

Just six months after its introduction—and while it was sold in only about a third of the country—Diet Coke jumped to No. 4 among all soft drinks in advertising awareness last month.

According to adWatch, a monthly survey of consumer awareness of advertising, Diet Coke's awareness score nearly doubled in January to 5.8% from 3.1% in December. The awareness score is the percentage of consumers who identified Diet Coke advertising as that first coming to mind of all soft-drink advertising seen or heard in the previous 30 days. For the January survey, adWatch, a joint project of Advertising Age and SRI Research Center Inc., Lincoln, Neb., polled a national random sample of 1,250 consumers by telephone from Jan. 1 through Jan. 21.

adWatch

With its January performance, Diet Coke passed Dr Pepper in advertising awareness and now is closing in on No. 3 7UP, which had a score of 7.3% in January. The top two brands continue to be Coca-Cola, No. 1 with a 25.2% score in January, and Pepsi-Cola, No. 2 with 18.6%.

Diet Coke, the first diet soft drink bearing the familiar Coke trademark of Coca-Cola Co., was introduced in New York last Aug. 1. According to adWatch figures, Diet Coke passed stablemate Tab—previously Coca-Cola's best-known diet drink—in awareness in November and has continued to widen its lead. Tab had an awareness score of 1.6% in January, giving Diet Coke a 3.5-to-1 margin over the older brand. Coca-Cola Co. reportedly has been spending much more heavily on Diet Coke advertising than it has on Tab.

■ A company spokesman said Diet Coke was in about 30% to 35% of the country last month and is now in about 80% of it. With the much wider distribution, it's conceivable that Diet Coke will crack the top three in soft-drink ad awareness in the adWatch February survey.

In other categories, a number of gift items tumbled substantially in ad awareness in the post-Christmas period. The steepest decline was posted by Polaroid, which fell 7.3 percentage points, to 9.3%, and to No. 3 in cameras. Kodak fell 3.6 points to 21.4% but continued to lead the category by a comfortable margin. (A change of plus or minus 2.8 percentage points is statistically

WHO AIDED KITCHENS?

It could be important to your marketing program. Because the same techniques that developed the new KitchenAid food processor, also put Baking Soda in more than thirty million refrigerators, developed Mellow Roast Coffee for General Foods, and Hi-C Drink Mix for Coca-Cola.

They could be just what you're looking for to restage that fading star, or create a successful new products' plan. Gerald Schoenfeld, Inc., consultants to America's major marketers, now offers the "Better Concepts Program."

Question: While you're developing new products, who's watching the scores?

The answer to better concept scores—scores that exceed all bench marks—is better concepts.

Whether it's developing new products from scratch or treating old products like new, better concepts are the key.

agency with two airline accounts. Continental was a client of WRG/West. In an attempt to ward off trouble, WRG management created a new agency out of its West Coast office—Johns, Cohen & Pasqualina, and made it part of its St. Louis-based Gardner Advertising subsidiary. This solution was short-lived. When Texas International took over the Continental cockpit, chairman Frank Lorenzo immediately fired the WRG subsidiary. Keye/Donna/-Pearlstein took over the $16 million business.

At the time, it was said that Texas Air and Continental marketing operations would remain separate. But in early December, Continental switched again—to Scali, McCabe, Sloves, which already handled Texas Air. Not only had Continental changed twice in 1982—this was its fourth change since 1980.

Another interesting move in the airline category was the worldwide business of British Airways, which was reported to have been politically motivated. Foote, Cone & Belding had held the business for 36 years. Suddenly, and without giving FCB a chance to fight back, British Air chairman Sir John King took the $29 million account to newly formed (through merger) Saatchi & Saatchi Compton. The political motive is believed to rest in the fact that Saatchi in the U.K. also played an important role in bringing the Conservative party to power; the airline's chairman was appointed by Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher.

The British Airways loss would account for 2% of FCB's worldwide revenues, the agency then said.

The second-biggest category for account shifts was health & beauty aids/household products, largely boosted by the changes at American Home Products, which moved $50 million worth of business from its in-house agency, John F. Murray Advertising. Whitehall Laboratories' Anacin went to William Esty Co.; Preparation H and Trendar to Kornhauser & Calene; Maximum Strength Anacin and Oxipur to Rosenfeld, Sirowitz & Lawson; Boyle-Midway's Aerowax, Easy-Off and new products to Cunningham & Walsh, and Sani-Flush to Hicks & Griest. This maneuver left only a skeleton of the house agency, which at the time was said to have been used as a scapegoat by AHP for the decline of brands such as Anacin.

Although the biggest fast-food move was not as dramatic as the McDonald's Corp. switch in 1981, it still was a major factor in the category. The combination of what was former General Foods' Burger Chef unit (through acquisition) with Hardee's is expected to total about $70 million in billings. Ogilvy & Mather handled Burger Chef and was thought to have a chance at the entire account, including the conversion of midwestern Burger Chef units to the Hardee's banner. But the power of the parent company prevailed and the business went to Benton & Bowles, the Hardee's agency.

In another example of a twice-switching account, E.&J. Gallo Winery in April officially named NH&S/USA to handle the bulk of its $25 million account, the principal piece of which was the premium-wines business. The assignment also included E.&J. brandy and Andre champagne. Gallo had been giving out project work as a means of an agency competition since Young & Rubicam resigned to take on competitor United Vintners in 1981. But while NH&S was endeavoring to come up with a new campaign that pleased Gallo management, Ogilvy & Mather, also a Gallo agency, slipped in a campaign idea of its own—"All the best"—that won it the premium-wine business.

Major changes also took place in the beer category, partially spurred by the brewing industry's merger and acquisition game. Stroh Brewery Co. acquired Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co., and key managers of Schlitz joined the Stroh marketing department. Schlitz and Schlitz Light beers then moved to MCA Advertising from J. Walter Thompson USA. Although current spending for the brands is low, the company said the total budget for the two could reach about $20 million. The Stroh and Stroh Light brands, with billings of about $17 million, which were at Doyle Dane Bernbach, moved to Marschalk Co. in a total reevaluation of the company's marketing efforts.

In addition, Adolph Coors Co. moved its Coors Light to Foote, Cone & Belding from Ted Bates Advertising/New York following a review. The latter kept regular Coors.

The largest change in the food category came as a result of a client conflict, which followed an agency merger. McDonald & Little, which became a unit of Ted Bates Worldwide in 1981, resigned about $13.5 million worth of Ralston Purina Co. children's cereal billings. That was caused by conflict with General Mills' Big G cereals at another Bates subsidiary, Campbell-Mithun.

Ralston's Cookie-Crisp and Dinky Donuts cereals ended up at Don Tennant Co., while Waffelos was awarded to Avrett, Free & Ginsberg.

The country's largest retailer shook things up when it decided to consolidate all its apparel advertising at one agency. NH&S landed

Mil-Mor shop open for (outside) business

By NANCY GIGES

With Virginia's largest commercial bank already signed on, A.H. Robins Co.'s in-house media buying operation, Mil-Mor Advertising, is on the prowl for outside business. It has formed a separate subsidiary, Mil-Mor Media, to service new clients.

With the parent company's blessing and backing, the 8-year-old Richmond, Va.-based agency—which placed some $32 million worth of advertising last year for Robins' pharmaceuticals, proprietaries and pet care products—is pointing to such strengths as its media research facilities, its financial stability (through Robins) and its reputation for excellence as a spot tv buyer.

Mil-Mor president Carl O'Hallahan said he plans to run the house business and outside businesses separately. Also, the media buying and account service will be completely separate. What Mil-Mor will draw on from the past is its extensive databank.

He also is touting the fact that the shop's buyers personally visit 120 markets around the country twice each year to get to know each market and its media. The media shop is known best for its spot tv planning and buying expertise; of the $32 million placed last year, about $8 million was in print.

Mr. O'Hallahan said outside business must reach $5 million in billings quickly for it to be feasible, "but I personally think we can reach $10 million within three years," he predicted.

He recently hired James E. Collier III, who formerly ran his own ad agency, to develop and run the external business. He hopes to have developed enough business to be able to add another person by early next year.

For 1983, the shop is expecting to increase the amount of business it handled over last year despite the loss of the $10 million Quencher business, which Robins is selling to Chattem Inc. (AA, Feb. 7). He said the number of people at the shop will remain at 13 because "we have been at about capacity."

Mr. O'Hallahan said the idea for seeking outside business has been germinating for a number of years, even before Robins reorganized several years ago. At the time, taking on outside business wasn't feasible because "we were too closely tied to the then Miller-Morton subsidiary," he said.

As part of the reorganization, designed primarily to group Robins' over-the-counter cough/-cold remedies with consumer products rather than prescription drugs, Mil-Mor was spun off as a separate subsidiary from the Robins operating groups. That move put the media-buying operation in a position to offer its services.

When Mr. O'Hallahan made his final proposal last year to Robins' management regarding opening its doors to outside clients, he had already lined up United Virginia Bank. Since then, the agency has implemented media programs for Medical College of Virginia, also in Richmond, and Newport News (Va.) Shipbuilding, producer of nuclear submarines.

All three use Westbrook Inc., also Richmond, for creative. Previously, the bank had used Campbell-Ewald, Atlanta, as agency of record. The medical college is experimenting with its first advertising, and the sub producer is also advertising for the first time.

The bank utilizes all major media research services and some spot-buying methods and services that Mr. O'Hallahan calls unique, such as tracking buys from the time they are made instead of waiting to follow up after they have run.

He sees as prime prospects for his agency's roster regional fast-food chains or auto dealers that may have been making buys separately.

He also pointed out that the shop is approaching creative agencies, which aren't interested in the media aspect and can't pitch large accounts without the media capability. He said he has a Westbrook-style arrangement with another agency, but he is not at liberty to discuss it at this time.

As for conflicts, he said he didn't see much to hinder the shop's growth. "If we still had Quencher, we wouldn't go after a cosmetics account, and I don't think we'd be interested in having Richardson-Vicks [a major Robins competitor] right now," he commented.#

the $30 million piece of Sears, Roebuck & Co. business, its first foot in the door at Sears. Losers were Foote, Cone & Belding, which had women's apparel; Stern Walters/-Earle Ludgin, with children's clothing, and McCann-Erickson, men's apparel. The Sears loss was enough to put McCann in Chicago over the brink; the agency closed the office.

Other interesting changes during the year included Lorillard's True cigarets (and smokeless tobacco), a $20 million account that went to Dancer Fitzgerald Sample from D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius, along with the creative team that launched the "You found it" campaign; E.F. Hutton & Co., which severed its 14-year relationship with Benton & Bowles, which spawned the "When E.F. Hutton talks" campaign, to take advertising in-house; a portion of the AT&T Long Lines account (about $17.5 million), which moved from N W Ayer to McCann-Erickson, and the $16 million Hallmark Cards account, which, after 37-years and a much-ballyhooed review, went from FCB to Young & Rubicam.

A similar examination of account changes has just been completed by J. William Wardell, group senior vp and head of new business at Doyle Dane Bernbach, New York.

Mr. Wardell's study includes only accounts $2 million and above. For 1982, he reported $1.25 billion in business, 160 individual accounts changing hands, compared with $1.3 billion and 194 accounts in 1981. Going back to 1979, Mr. Wardell reported 208 accounts changing that year and 164 accounts switching in 1980.#

spending. That makes agencies more desperate for new clients and more willing to make new-business pitches that may lead to full-fledged shootouts.

Clients with slumping sales also tend to become desperate; they may find fault with existing advertising and seek a fresh campaign by a new agency. In addition, some clients feel that certain advertising styles—such as humorous or soft-sell emotional ads—are inappropriate these days. Hard times demand hard sells, they say. That, too, may trigger a search for a new agency and a shootout.

"Clients have come to view agencies differently in this economy," said an executive from a Midwest agency. "There are competitions at the drop of a hat. Clients are more careful and scared if share goes down. And agencies are pitching accounts they wouldn't ordinarily consider."

He cites as examples J. Walter Thompson USA's Chicago office pitching Evan's Furs, a relatively small Chicago retailer.

Furthermore, advertisers with more than one agency seem to be more willing to initiate a competition among all their agencies for an assignment. A recent example is Kellogg's switching to JWT from Leo Burnett USA for a new cereal, Crispix. Burnett had worked on the business for months, but Kellogg asked Thompson to come up with some speculative advertising, in effect precipitating a shootout.

Most speculative presentations involve more drama than that. Typically, a company discloses that its account is being reviewed, or "up for grabs," and invites a number of agencies—or accedes to their pleas for invitations—to try for the business. After initial meetings on the agency's past work, philosophy, expertise in the market and the like, the advertiser will pare the list of applicants to a handful of finalists who are asked to come up with potential ads.

The sample ads can range from rough storyboards to finished and tested spots, depending on the advertiser. In reviewing its $16 million account, for example, Hallmark required the contenders—37-year incumbent Foote, Cone & Belding, Burnett, O&M and eventual winner Young & Rubicam—to prepare two finished and tested 30-second spots and another in storyboard form with finished music.

Holiday Inns last month completed a painstaking agency hunt that had begun formally last September with visits to 12 agencies by company executives. The search was headed by Christopher C. Browne, senior vp-marketing of Holiday Inns Hotel Group and a veteran of agency reviews (including the move to Thompson by his former employer, Burger King, seven years ago).

He and his staff spent many hours deciding what Holiday Inns wanted in an agency, weeding out the unlikely ones before coming up with the 12 to be visited. The field was pared to five after the visits, during which the client team found "many of the agencies were inappropriate to us," he said.

The five finalists then were sent a list of eight questions, which didn't deal specifically with Holiday Inns but with service industries. Among the questions: What is the best airline advertising and why?

After the responses were received, the selection team visited the agencies again to discuss their answers. In the meantime, the agencies were doing their own research into the lodging industry and the prospective client. "We had people checking in and out of Holiday Inns," said Leo-Arthur Kelmenson, chairman of Kenyon & Eckhardt, New York.

The second visits narrowed the list to two finalists: K&E and Campbell-Ewald of Detroit. Holiday Inns then paid each agency "a significant sum," Mr. Kelmenson said, to produce spec creative based on a marketing strategy developed by the company. The presentations included tv storyboards, music, print ads and radio spots and lasted four to six hours.

"It was really neck and neck," said Mr. Browne. But on Jan. 21, two days after the presentations—and some six months after the search began—Holiday Inns called Mr. Kelmenson and gave him the good news that K&E had won the $15 million account.

Agencies tapped for the dubious honor of being a finalist will go to great lengths, other than by actually creating ads, to impress the potential client. During the Hallmark competition in which the agency he founded was involved, for example, David Ogilvy himself found it convenient to pay a visit to the folks in Kansas City.

In its pursuit of the $10 million People account, New York agency Geer, Dubois hired actress Liv Ullman to be the agency receptionist when some important executives of the magazine were due to visit.

"Sales of People are greatly influenced by the cover," explained agency chairman Peter Geer. "We thought we would put a famous face on our cover."

It may have helped: Geer, DuBois beat out some much larger competitors and is now running a test campaign in a final faceoff with incumbent Holland & Callaway.

In the hot competition for the Sears corporate merchandising account, the Chicago office of JWT/USA brought in a New York heavyweight, its current chairman and former creative director Burt Manning, to work on the speculative ads. A Sears incumbent, JWT was battling the Chicago offices of Ogilvy & Mather and NH&S (the eventual winner), also Sears incumbents, for the business estimated to be worth $15 million to $40 million in annual billings.

Agency attitudes toward getting involved in speculative presentations vary, but no major agency appears to have a hard policy against doing so. Ogilvy reportedly had such a policy once, but obviously no longer does. Doyle Dane Bernbach says it tries to avoid creative shootouts, but still finds itself participating on occasion.

Regardless of its philosophy on shootouts, an agency often won't participate if it's the incumbent, believing—correctly, according to most agency executives—that its chances are very slim if the client is dissatisfied enough to ask the others. Incumbents weren't involved in most of last year's largest shootouts.

Y&R is probably the major agency most enthusiastic about speculative presentations, no doubt because of a 1981-82 hot streak in which it added $115 million in billings in a 12-month period, much of it by winning shootouts. "The way we approach new business is obviously working," an agency executive exulted after a Y&R delegation led by chairman Ed Ney bagged the Hallmark business.

"They have it down to a fine-tuned approach," a rival agency executive conceded. "And they spend," he added. (Y&R may have been supplanted as the hot new-business shop by NH&S, which has won the Budweiser Light, Sears corporate merchandising and Sears apparel accounts in recent competitions.)

Clients also differ on the need for spec presentations—sometimes within the same corporation. Thus, American Telephone & Telegraph's Long Lines division last year chose McCann-Erickson to handle its account after making it clear that it not only wasn't asking for, but wouldn't look at, speculative creative work.

"We were dealing with completely professional-quality agencies; we simply did not think it was necessary for them to go through a lot of trouble," a Long Lines division spokesman says.

But the same AT&T's new American Bell subsidiary staged one of the year's most intensely fought creative competitions for its account, expected to spend $30 million this year and grow rapidly in coming years.

Robert T. Warstler, director of advertising for American Bell's advanced information systems (AIS) unit, said the decision to ask for speculative presentations was a good one. "It allowed us to choose effectively, intelligently and correctly," he said.

Hallmark also feels "very good" about requiring its finalists to come up with campaigns in about 100 days, said William Johnson, Hallmark director of special projects. "The creative was a very important part of the assignment to us," he says. "We wanted advertising that would make our business grow and we wanted great advertising."

Mr. Johnson said Hallmark couldn't judge the agencies the way most agencies say they want to be judged—on their reputation and past work. "Work for others wouldn't show an understanding of our business, of our objectives, of our relationship with retailers and the general public," he said. "Greeting cards aren't sold like soap or beer. The agency's ability to understand the industry and our corporation was reflected in those [speculative] commercials."

Agencies complain, however, that they cannot come up with their best work for a client in just a few weeks or months; good advertising comes only as the end result of having intimate knowledge of both the client and the business, they say.

"You're missing any kind of relationship with the client where you can trade back and forth," said Brian Sherwood, senior vp-group account supervisor at Geer, DuBois. "It's a feeling-the-leg-of-the-elephant kind of thing."

Robert Prentice, a veteran advertising and marketing consultant who has been involved in many agency searches, noted another serious problem caused by speculative presentations: They consume large amounts of agency time and talent. In its unsuccessful bid for American Bell, for example, Campbell-Ewald reportedly had 50 people working fulltime on the project, with another 150 pitching in occasionally.

"I think it is unfair to the agency's other clients," Mr. Prentice said. "Obviously, it is going to take away the time of people to a greater degree than if they were just going to make a presentation" involving no new creative work.

"If you let yourself get caught in the speculative presentation rat race long enough, you spend all your time on prospective business," said Mr. Gerfen of Mathieu, Gerfen & Bresner. "That eventually hurts your present clients."

For all their protestations, agencies sometimes prepare speculative creative even if it isn't requested. And when they don't, they often wonder if any of the other entrants will.

For example, when RC Cola Co. executives went hunting for a new agency recently, they not only said they weren't interested in creative presentations but would walk out if any agency showed up with speculative work. Nonetheless, just before the last round of meetings, one of the competing agencies called Mr. Prentice, the consultant on the search, wanting to know if RC really wouldn't look at any proposed ads. The agency said it was afraid that if it complied and the other entrants didn't, it might lose out. Mr. Prentice assured it that the client was serious. (Dancer Fitzgerald Sample eventually won the account.)

Speculative creative work can cost a lot of money, and most of it comes out of agency pockets. Even though, according to Harry Paster, executive director of the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies, more clients seem to be paying at least something to cover agencies' costs in shootouts than did so several years ago, agencies say the reimbursements still don't cover the outlays. "A lot of people pay you money, but you always spend more," said Marvin Sloves, chairman of Scali, McCabe, Sloves.

Geer, DuBois says it was in a pitch last year in which the prospective client paid the agency 1/25 of what it actually spent. Even the $100,000 Hallmark paid each of its four finalists fell far short of the costs incurred, according to the agencies.

More recently, the combined spending of the agencies in the Sears corporate merhandising shootout, who produced big-production commercials using expensive music houses, was almost $1 million, according to a source close to that competition. The agencies doubt that they will be adequately reimbursed, if at all, he said. Sears won't comment.

For smaller agencies in particular, speculative presentations present a real Catch-22. They need new business, but the current economy makes them less able to afford the shootouts that might bring in that business. And in any economy, they can hardly match the lavish spending of some of their big competitors.

Mr. Prentice, the consultant, believes some shops are actually unhappy when they can't make creative pitches. "They complain about it, but the reason they do it is they do not know how else to present their qualifications. While they are getting better, an awful lot of them just don't know how to present adequately. But then again, that is tempered by the fact that they know a lot of advertisers don't know how to judge an agency other than by looking at the copy they prepare."# trademark, San Francisco State University economics professor Ralph Anspach, is unimpressed by suggestions that his challenge to Parker Brothers has opened a hole in the trademark laws. President of tiny Anti-Monopoly, Berkeley, he has spent the last nine years in court fighting Parker Brothers for the right to market his company's two games, Anti-Monopoly and Anti-Monopoly II.

"We had no interest, then or now, in canceling their trademark," said Mr. Anspach, 56, last week, calling his case a "saga." (A book is in the works, he added.) But, he said, Parker Brothers gave him no choice when they threatened infringement actions and rejected compromise brand names such as Anti-Monopolist or Anti-Monopolism.

"This is a very specific case involving a particular product, a company that never advertised its quality, and which got caught in an abuse of the trademark law," he said. "The sky hasn't fallen in."

What concerned trademark observers contacted last week is the San Francisco court's position that trademark protection can be extended to a brand only so long as its "primary significance" is to identify the producer, not the product.

In the "Monopoly" case, the court ruled that the trademark had become generic because a majority of recent and future buyers of the game, questioned in a controversial "motivation" survey commissioned by Mr. Anspach, said they bought the game because they were interested in it and didn't "much care who makes it."

The San Francisco court said the evidence showed that General Mills and Parker Brothers "very successfully promoted the game of Monopoly, but that in doing it they promoted 'Monopoly' as the 'name of the game,' that it became generic in the sense that we use that term in trademark law."

The court said its opinion didn't foreclose trademark protection for the name of a game that does not "embody the corporate name of its producer," but it insisted that "source indication" be the primary purpose of a trademark even when it is made by only one company.

"That doesn't say anything about whether the public perceives the names to be generic or a trademark," said Quentin Riegel, assistant general counsel for the National Assn. of Manufacturers.

"I try to be an optimist," he said, "and think that people will try to market products on their own merits."

Parker Brothers, in an unsuccessful bid to discredit the motivation survey, had submitted to the court of appeals a survey focusing on Procter & Gamble's Tide, which showed that a majority of surveyed consumers bought the brand because they liked the detergent and not because they liked Procter & Gamble products. The San Francisco court said detergents are a "very different subject," and that it's uncertain whether the tests in the Monopoly case could be "mechanically extended." But under certain circumstances, it said, P&G "might have cause for alarm."

With the battle lost, General Mills and Parker Brothers refrained last week from fresh warnings of a dire future for trademark holders. Parker Brothers' official reaction on the outcome of the marathon struggle was a brief three paragraphs, noting its continued belief in the validity of the Monopoly trademark and asserting that the U.S. court action "has no effect on the validity of the 'Monopoly' trademark registrations in foreign countries."# steady at 11.8%, enabling it to move up to No. 2 in the group.

Also falling sharply was Atari, down 5.6 points to 20.6% in home electronics. Atari remained the category leader by a big margin, however, over No. 2 Intellivision (4.6%) and No. 3 Apple (4.2%).

A number of other advertisers recorded statistically significant changes from December last month. Folger's strengthened its No. 1 spot in coffee & tea with a 3.8 point increase to 20%. Tylenol, No. 1 in medicine & drug awareness, continued to bounce back from a self-imposed halt in advertising following last summer's poisoning deaths; it recorded its third straight month of significant gains with a 3.8 point rise to 35%, its highest adWatch score yet.

And Bright, a new cigaret from R.J. Reynolds Industries, leaped from zero mentions in December to 3.3% in January, which was good for No. 3 behind Marlboro and Winston in tobacco products.

New categories: AdWatch last month refined its questioning on food advertising, introducing three new categories: Canned foods, frozen foods and snack foods.

In canned foods the top three in ad awareness were Campbell's, 11.4%; Del Monte, 7%, and Green Giant, 3.3%. The frozen foods leaders were General Foods' Birds Eye, 9.1%; Stouffer's, 5.3%, and Swanson (a Campbell Soup Co. brand), 4.4%.

PepsiCo's Frito-Lay division was the big winner in snack foods, snaring all three spots. No. 1 was Doritos chips, with a score of 3.4%, followed by Frito-Lay/Frito's with 2.5% and Lay's potato chips, with 2.2% of the responses.#

High Court to rule on art use of money

WASHINGTON—The Supreme Court will decide whether the Secret Service can force Time Inc. to stop using pictures of money as editorial art in its magazines. Though reproductions of money as advertising art are not directly at issue in the case, related Secret Service rules bar that practice as well.

A lower court already has ruled in Time's favor.

In another First Amendment case, the court last week also agreed to decide whether local governments can ban political advertising from public property. The Los Angeles ordinance involved in the case was struck down by the U.S. circuit court of appeals in San Francisco last year.#

GALLUP & ROBINSON ANNOUNCES...

4 NEW FEATURES FOR TESTING YOUR TV COMMERCIALS

GIVE MORE INFORMATION . . . GREATER SENSITIVITY

For 12 years Gallup & Robinson has provided In-View, a comprehensive TV testing service based on a real-world, in-home test environment, multiple measures and a wide range of product norms. Now G&R offers 4 new features for even better performance evaluation and creative guidance:

1 Three-City Coverage
Offers a more widely dispersed sample from major markets in the East, Mid, and West United States. All tests still will be on independent channels for low air costs and minimum public exposure of test commercial.

2 Diagnostics
Three additional diagnostic questions are offered as standard with every test. You may select the questions. Allows you to directly ask about such things as what was liked, disliked, what was confusing, hard to believe, irritating; it allows you to assess responses to presenters, or probe specific commercial objectives, etc. These questions are in addition to the standard 5-6 Impact questions now asked.

3 Improved Persuasion Measure
Instead of asking simply if the commercial increased buying interest, the new question will be asked to get at the degree it increased buying interest. Thus, you will be able to judge the relative power of persuasion, which particularly will be helpful when comparing different commercial executions.

4 Centralized Interviewing
Allows for more complicated questionnaires, immediate monitoring, and for interviewing decisions to be made at higher levels, when necessary.

CHARACTERISTICS OF IN-VIEW

- 12 Years operating experience
- On-air, in-home test environment
- Invited viewing of test program
- 3-City Coverage
- Prime time testing/low cost air time
- Minimum public exposure of test commercial
- Multiple measures—assess total performance, give creative guidance
- Verbatim comments/5-6 open end questions
- 3 Diagnostic questions
- Attitude change optional
- Wide range of product norms
- Centralized interviewing
- High reliability/sensitivity
- Test in rough or finish form
- Multiple exposure possible
- Test every week
- Competitive syndicated costs
- Flexible—can add questions; identify target audience

Fourth nets on stage at NATPE

Las Vegas—This year's National Assn. of Television Program Executives (NATPE) convention, which begins here March 16, represents a major testing ground for several issues that may shape the syndication marketplace for years to come.

The NATPE meeting is the first organized and orchestrated pow-wow between studios and station groups to hammer out the feasibility and scope of the fourth-network proposals that have sprouted in bunches over the past two months.

In addition, it will be a test of how syndicators and stations will respond to expanded programing hours by the networks, which in turn resulted in a shrinkage of traditional syndication programing slots.

The issue is worsened by the spread of two-hour early local news programing by network affiliates. The combination of network programing expansion and local news going to two hours has eliminated affiliated stations as prime markets for syndicated properties. That situation has had a pronounced impact on prospects for launching new first-run syndicated programing.

At the same time, syndicators and programers are forced to strike deals under the cloud of uncertainty cast by the ensuing debate over repeal of the Federal Communications Commission financial interest and domestic

Hefty net rate hikes forecast

Buyers gird for fight

By CRAIG REISS

The network tv upfront selling season is still months away, but already the rumblings of advertiser strategies can be heard and the stakes have become clear in what has been described as "the greatest poker game in the history of network-advertiser relations."

In the midst of a recession during last July's upfront market and in the face of declining network audience delivery, the three nets were able to set several records: Most revenue ever generated in upfront sales; record double-digit cost-per-thousand rate increases, and CBS' dropping of demographic guarantees in prime time.

Since then, advertisers, and especially their agencies, have smarted over what were clearly network victories. The troubling question for advertisers now becomes: With the networks emboldened by last year's successes, will double-digit upfront rate hikes become standard operating procedure? The answer, probably, is yes.

"The only way to prevent it is to have the advertisers get together and agree among themselves not to take what the networks are offering," said one media director of a major ad agency. "But that would be collusion and it will never hap-

Tv pilots hint strategies

By DIANE MERMIGAS

Peeks at concepts for fall network series indicate NBC will be moving out of its urban environment to set comedies and dramas in southern and rural locales, while ABC and CBS are sticking with tried-and-true program formats, albeit with new twists.

NBC is taking the most adventuresome steps as it moves to balance out its current prime time schedule. ABC and CBS are hoping to fill weak time slots and find series that eventually may replace their aging hit shows.

The No. 3 network has ordered 12 comedy, 14 dramatic and three comedy/variety pilots; ABC 11 dramas and six situation comedies, and CBS six hourlong dramas and 14 half-hour sitcoms. A good number of the pilots will be incorporated into the 1983-84 prime time schedules, to be unveiled in late April and early May.

Thumbnail descriptions of the pilots revealed last week offer some glimmers of program innovations which could become bellwethers of future trends. ABC, for instance, seems hooked on computer sciences and alternative life forms in pilots like "Wishman," starring Joseph Bottoms as a bioengineer on the run with a

Sears breaks its $35 million coordinated apparel drive

By NANCY MILLMAN

Chicago—Sears, Roebuck & Co.'s unified apparel advertising makes its debut on network tv this week, and will introduce a new clothing line for young men under the Boston Athletic Club name.

Robert Levin, senior vp-management representative, and Joel Hochberg, exec vp-director of creative services at agency NH&S/USA here, explained that the apparel campaign is designed as an image-building, brand-building effort, at a time when Sears is moving to upgrade both its clothing lines and store displays.

The No. 1 retailer's goal is to induce the 36 million households that shop at Sears for hard goods to think of the store as a place to buy clothing as well. Its total annual ad budget for apparel is about $35 million.

The campaign continues the "You're in for a change at Sears" theme that was launched with the introduction of the Evonne Goolagong activewear line late last year. Each of the clothing lines—Goolagong, Cheryl Tiegs sportswear and girls' lines, Arnie Palmer menswear, BAC (as the line also is called in advertising) and Winnie the Pooh children's clothes—will have its own advertising, and will be included in corporate apparel spots where Cheryl Tiegs introduces each of the brands.

The Boston Athletic Club line of contemporary young men's shirts and slacks is being called "a new breed of sportswear. . .sportswear with spirit" in a 30-second commercial that has a "Chariots of Fire" feeling. The "You're in for a change" theme music is adapted for each individual line—dramatic for BAC; exuberant for Goolagong; jazzy for Cheryl Tiegs, and

Atlantic City casinos put money on ads

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

For almost five years, Atlantic City's casinos have managed without having to splurge on advertising. But with their Las Vegas counterparts now looking back on a slack year, the people who operate the nine gaming establishments near the resort town's famed boardwalk are pressing harder to keep the eastern gambling crowd's mind off Vegas.

One hotel, the Golden Nugget, has scored a major coup: Luring Frank Sinatra—long associated with Las Vegas and Caesars Palace—to the East Coast not only to perform, but also to pitch the hotel and casino in tv commercials aimed at big spenders.

Much of the advertising by the Atlantic City casinos has been introductory in nature. Now, various establishments are taking direct aim at certain segments of the gambling public. Not only have Atlantic City casino owners benefited from the recession, which has kept East Coast gamblers away from Las Vegas, but they also have found that people who come to a hotel and casino strictly to gamble prefer staying closer to home.

There are 54 million people within a one-day drive of Atlantic City. Many of the gamblers among that number have shunned the city for Las Vegas. Now looking to cut travel costs, these same peo-

FCC's syndie-rule gala: 42 set to testify today

By MAURINE CHRISTOPHER

The pace at the Federal Communications Commission's hearing today on the proposal to repeal the network domestic-syndication and financial-interest bans will have to be almost as brisk as oldtime vaudeville at the Palace in New York.

It's a one-day show with a cast of 42 invited to Washington to state their case in five to 10 minutes and to answer questions from the seven commissioners in the breaks between the six acts.

The 42 are a disparate group of players representing consumer activist and church groups, as well as very interested parties on both sides of this raging real-life business drama.

A surprise entry in the cast is Westinghouse Broadcasting & Cable, hitherto a bystander in the latest chapter of a regulatory saga that started in the 1960s largely because of its complaints against network dominance of the airwaves.

Westinghouse's outside counsel, John Lane of Wilkes, Artis, Hedrick & Lane, will be bracketed as a part of the No. 2 early-morning panel. Group W won't disclose its position on this $1 billion-plus issue before the hearing, but the speculation is that it will come down somewhere in the middle.

A Group W source said neutral would not describe their stand "since we will have something to say, and it will not be the old Westinghouse position." The old Westinghouse position, of course, would have been to fight vigorously to retain the barriers.

Network executives—vp-general counsel Everett Erlick for ABC, president Bob Mulholland for NBC and corporate president Tom Wyman for CBS Inc.—will be in that same panel along with opponents from the Motion Picture Assn. and the Committee for Prudent Deregulation, an umbrella group made up of creative people.

Booked for an afternoon panel to support the Big 3's petition for repeal are representatives of their affiliate boards, in this case in a sequence with status-quo proponents from the Assn. of Independent TV Stations and National Assn. of Television Program Executives International. The sponsors' opposition to letting the networks return to domestic syndication and coproduction will be voiced by the

New life-style magazine for affluent men

Fairchild plans 'M' for fall

By STUART J. ELLIOTT

New York—Fairchild Publications is planning its third consumer magazine, even before the second makes its debut.

The division of Capital Cities Communications will bring out, probably in October, M, a monthly life-style magazine for the man with income and interests more upscale than those reading Conde Nast's Gentlemen's Quarterly. It will follow on the heels of the consumer edition of Sportstyle, a monthly for active sports participants, due to go on sale nationwide March 24.

"We're not going head to head with GQ," said Michael Coady, group senior vp in charge of M. "We want to find a new niche, similar to the niche W has in the women's field. That's where we're going to position M, at the high end of the market." W, Fairchild's first consumer magazine, has been a success. Circulation has tripled, to 210,000, since W bowed in April, 1972.

Unlike W, spun off from a trade paper, Women's Wear Daily, M will be the successor to a trade fashion magazine with a circulation of 20,000, Men's Wear. Mr. Coady hopes "to keep that and expand it," so M can start with a circulation of 70,000-plus.

M "certainly will have a strong appeal to the trade," said Mr. Coady, who is also editor of Women's Wear Daily. "There's always a trade component in a very good fashion magazine. But it won't be specifically directed to how many shirts sold with this type of cuff last week. M [will cover] how to live the most elegant life you can live with taste and style."

▪ M will retain the Men's Wear rate card, which charges $3,740 for a b&w page and $5,750 for a four-color page. To build circulation, said Gene Fahy, who will be publisher, "we'll do what we did with W," i.e., send out subscription solicitations to top department stores' active charge-card customers. Newsstand distribution in major markets also is being worked out, he Agency: SSC&B: Lintas, Toronto. Chart shows potential market Diet Coke is shooting for in some nations, compared with U.S.

By CAROLYN HULSE

Coca-Cola Co. will launch a massive international rollout of its new Diet Coke this month, following closely on the heels of the new product's U.S. debut. It promises to be the most ambitious international launch in industry history.

Marc Hamburger, manager of marketing planning and services in Coca-Cola's Atlanta headquarters, said Diet Coke will be introduced worldwide "with equal fervor and with the same No. 1 priority" given it in the U.S.

But Coke's new product will face a host of problems abroad. An ADVERTISING AGE survey of the prospects for Diet Coke's entry in 11 countries shows that, despite the extensive distribution network already in place for Coke, the world's largest-selling soft drink, Diet Coke's appeal will be hamstrung on five fronts: By local laws that ban saccharin, that are pending on aspartame (G.D. Searle & Co.'s new sweetener) or that generally restrict artificial sweeteners; by unacceptability of the word "diet" due to regulated medical usage or negative social connotations; by competition from mineral water marketers, now introducing flavored varieties; by powerful sugar interests, and by the lack of a "figure-maintenance" concept or the view that such a concept is an American aberration.

For the worldwide launch, McCann-Erickson, Diet Coke's agency outside the U.S. (except for Canada), is working on "pattern advertising"—a limited number of adaptable campaigns—in an effort to coordinate the ad pitches.

According to Mr. Hamburger, Diet Coke advertising will stick with its taste approach wherever possible and emphasize "figure maintenance" only in the countries where it has to build acceptability for the diet category.

By August, Diet Coke will be on the shelves in as Industry begins its uphill climb vs. FTC

By RICHARD L. GORDON

WASHINGTON—The advertising industry's chief witness—Assn. of National Advertisers general counsel Gilbert Weil—was challenged last week by a key congressman, who characterized the industry plan for restricting Federal Trade Commission ad regulation as "rolling back 60 years of history."

In the face of that skepticism, the ad industry launched anew its uphill battle to convince Congress to narrow FTC's basic authority to regulate advertising. The industry wants the lawmakers to take away FTC's power to attack "unfair" advertising and to narrow its power to regulate deceptive ads by having Congress, not FTC, define how deception will be determined in law.

With a bigger Democratic majority in the House this Congress, a senior Republican on the House energy and commerce committee said the outlook is not good for the ad industry's proposals. The proposals will be discussed, said Rep. Norman Lent (R., N.Y.), but he dismissed the debate as "intellectual Ping-Pong." He explained, "I don't think they will get serious consideration in this committee. The FTC may be shifting to the right, but this committee is moving to the left."

The industry was not surprised by the cool reception it received before the House subcommittee on commerce, transportation and tourism; a more conservative House had rejected its proposals last year. But ad lobbyists hope to do better in the Republican-controlled Senate, where hearings open before the commerce committee this week. Informed observers anticipate the prospect from

Future cloudy for Sunday supplements

By STUART EMMRICH

When the Atlanta Constitution and Journal decided several years ago to scrap the sleepy, garden-club atmosphere of its longtime Sunday magazine and replace it with the flash and substance of its new Atlanta Weekly, executives at the paper had high hopes for the publication.

A new editor was brought in from Texas Monthly, a stable of talented writers was hired and the editorial budget was allowed to balloon, all in the hopes that these changes would help the Sunday paper stem a worrisome tide of falling circulation.

Three years later, the editor was gone, the writing staff was reduced to one fulltime person and the magazine returned to being a local imitation of Parade or Family Weekly.

It wasn't for lack of editorial achievements that the experiment failed. The magazine consistently attracted high praise from readers and competitors: A poll of newspaper editors in 1981 ranked Atlanta Weekly among the country's top five Sunday magazines (AA, Nov. 23, '81).

But Constitution executives soon discovered that all these changes weren't paying off in circulation growth for the newspaper and that the magazine was turning into an expensive drain on company profits. The bottom line won out.

In Florida, editors at the St. Petersburg Times decided earlier this year to end the publication of its 15-year-old Floridian, a Sunday supplement that was losing about $300,000 a year. The once-substantial magazine was estimated to be carrying almost 90% less advertising than a year ago and weekly issues were sometimes no larger than 16 pages. "It had to attract enough advertising to give it the weight that would enable it to be a serious publication. Sixteen pages just wasn't enough," explained Robert Haiman, until recently the paper's executive editor. Mr. Haiman said the Floridian never made more than a marginal profit in any of its 15 years.

"New York Times Magazine" prepares for growth—Page 60.

The St. Petersburg Times and the Atlanta Constitution are not alone. From Denver to Miami to Seattle, Sunday magazines are having a tough time of it these days. Sunday MAG/NET, an association of 56 newspaper supplements, reported that ad pages for its papers were down 21.1% in 1982. Four other independent Sunday newspaper magazines—in the Los Angeles Times, Newsday, New York Times and San Francisco Examiner—had ad page losses ranging from 8% to 26%.

Editors at some Sunday magazines are talking privately about the uncertain future of their publications, and some newspapers that have risked considerable investments to start these magazines in the last few years may be having second thoughts about the decision.

These were supposed to be good times for Sunday magazines. Papers in San Antonio, Tex., Tulsa, Okla., Westchester-Rockland, N.Y., Orlando, Fla., Dayton, O., Norfolk, Va., Hartford, Conn., and suburban Los Angeles have added or redesigned Sunday supplements in the last two years, both to build the papers' circulation and image.

The successes that such papers as the Boston Globe, the New York Times and the Washington Post have had with their Sunday magazines in recent years further whetted the appetite of newspaper executives many as 35 countries, going first into affluent countries with developed "diet" markets like Norway, Australia, Argentina, England and South Africa. Rollout was completed last month in Puerto Rico and Canada, the first country to approve the use of aspartame in soft drinks.

At least one competitor suspects the bold Diet Coke rollout may be a mistake. "Caffeine-free is the thing to watch internationally," said Terry Fassburg, director of pr for PepsiCo International, "not the diet market, which is very small." (See related story, Page 70). Diet Pepsi now leads Coca-Cola's Tab in the diet category outside the U.S. Only 20% of the world's diet soft-drink sales occur outside of the U.S. Also, only 2% to 3% of the total soft-drink market outside the U.S. and Canada is accounted for by low-calorie drinks.

The problems facing Diet Coke in its rollout are most evident in the leading markets targeted by Coca-Cola:

Canada

The diet-drink category in Canada has been soaring since low-calorie soft drinks were relaunched with aspartame in 1981, following the saccharin ban of the late 1970s. The market grew to 6.4% of the total soft-drink market in 1981 to 12.4% last year, and is expected to reach 15.2% by the end of this year. Diet Coke, like other U.S. brands, was helped in Canada because of overspill advertising from the eastern U.S., where the product was first launched in the states. The ads helped create early brand awareness.

John Brennan, vp-marketing for Coke Canada, said Diet Coke—whose advertising by SSC&B stresses taste—will "be the No. 1 diet drink in Canada by the end of 1983, outstripping the industry by 2 to 1." Mr. Brennan added that he expects even troubled Tab to end up in the No. 2 spot.

But Arrol Simms, marketing director for PepsiCo Canada, disagreed, noting that "displacing us is going to be harder than they think." Commenting on the launch of Diet Coke in Ontario last October, simultaneous with Pepsi's launch of caffeine-free Pepsi Free, Mr. Simms called it "more show than go," adding that Diet Pepsi (last year's diet leader) has felt "no significant impact so far."

Australia

In Australia, where the diet segment is 12% of the total soft-drink market, Tab has well over 50% of the cola category (some estimates give it as much as 85%), with Diet Pepsi holding a smaller share. Matthew Percival, assistant pr manager for Coca-Cola Australia, said he expects Diet Coke's Australian introduction by mid-year.

The entire soft-drink market has been undergoing a slow but steady decline here, with diet drinks static over the last year, following the recent introduction and success of mineral waters (including new flavored varieties).

Gordon Richards, marketing manager of Glaxo, which has the lion's share of the growing mineral water market, says "the increase in the market has got to be coming out of soft drinks." Frank Swan of Cadbury-Schweppes, which holds 25% of the soft-drink market behind Coke's 40%, disagreed, adding that "mineral waters have brought in new diet drinkers."

Argentina

Two and one-half years after the introduction of Tab, the first diet product to come into the market, category sales account for 5.5% of the over-all soft-drink market. Tab was a success, and was soon followed by Coca-Cola's Low-Cal Sprite in May, 1981, and Seven-Up Co.'s Diet 7UP last September.

But Seven-Up president Ruben Royes is not optimistic about the potential for growth in the segment here, since "market studies show that even the most emancipated diet-drink consumer will seldom ask for such a drink at restaurants or pubs," and that diet drinks will continue to appeal mostly to women.

Diet Coke launch

of the soft-drink market) expect Diet Coke will go on the shelves sometime in June, but they believe that Coke will have to address image problems here, largely due to the race issue.

In this segregated market, where soft drinks are expected to grow 12% this year, blacks consume 70% of the soft drinks. But only 4% of that is low-calorie, indicating that blacks are not as a whole diet-conscious. Among whites, however, 20% of the soft drinks consumed are in the category.

Tab now holds 80% of the diet segment, with Diet Pepsi (which still is not available nationwide) covering the rest.

Norway

Artificial sweeteners are forbidden in Norway except for use by diabetics, and the term diet or low-calorie cannot appear on labels; drinks like Tab are technically only for use by diabetics. Still, the irony is that 11% of soft drinks sold in Norway are diet—only the U.S. and Canada rank higher.

In countries like Norway and Germany, where the word diet connotes illness, Diet Coke will become Coke Light, but that may cause problems, too. Authorities are warning that if there is a sharp increase in consumption of these drinks, they will ban the "light" name and maybe diet drinks as well.

Thus an aggressive Diet Coke advertising and promotion campaign could hurt everyone in a country where there traditionally has been an agreement among soft-drink companies to limit marketing of diet drinks to diabetics and in-store marketing, sources said.

Coke's plans to launch Diet Coke in Norway await a decision from health authorities on whether new sweeteners such as aspartame will be approved for use.

Great Britain

In England, the Diet Coke formulation is still in question. While saccharin is approved, two new sweeteners—aspartame and acesulphane—likely will be okayed by year's end.

Diet drinks account for 5% of Britain's total soft-drink market, but as much as 45% of that is accounted for by Schweppes' Slimline range, and only 20% by colas. However, the diet-cola segment grew by 30% in volume last year with little promotional support, and many observers believe it is ripe for expansion.

Diet Pepsi holds 55% of this business, with Tab trailing at 15%. The Diet Coke introduction could mean the end of Tab, or at least a dramatic cut in its sales.

Schweppes' marketing director Mike Hewitt said, "My view is that Diet Coke will waken the whole U.K. diet market. It will bring new awareness of diet drinks and fit in with all the market trends. A third of the population is interested in controlling their weight, and not all of them drink low-calorie drinks." Schweppes does not see Diet Coke pinching share from its Slimline products and is prepared to enjoy the market growth following a Coke assault.

Germany

Germany, Coke's third-largest market behind the U.S. and Canada, has an undeveloped diet-drink category that will pose problems for Diet Coke. One reason, again, is heavy mineral water consumption, and another is that laws permit only limited use of sweeteners. Even Coca-Cola's "light" brands, Fanta Light and Lift Light, did poorly here, with small ad support.

If Diet Coke is introduced in April or May as expected, Coca-Cola, according to one insider, "will have to create a brand-new market with heavy advertising pressure—at least $4.5 million." In addition, the name will have to be Coca-Cola Light or Coke Light, since "diet" carries implications of illness here as well.

Japan

The diet soft-drink market in Japan is "10 to 15 years behind the U.S.," said Jimmy Page, assistant to the president of Coca-Cola Japan, partly because the government strictly limits the amount of saccharin to a level well below that allowed in the U.S. According to Mr. Page, "there is no true diet drink in Japan, by American standards." For example, Diet Pepsi, which was introduced in Tokyo several months ago primarily for westerners, has only 50% fewer calories than regular Pepsi-Cola.

Coca-Cola Co. decided not to market Tab in Japan because research found consumers did not like the taste of saccharin. Diet Coke, likewise, probably will not be launched in Japan until the government approves aspartame, which could happen this year.

Even so, the diet segment remains a mere 0.1% of the total soft-drink market, primarily because "there is still little consciousness about counting calories as is done in the West," according to Marty Rose, who handles Pepsi's account in Japan for J. Walter Thompson Co. He added, however, that interest in dieting gradually has in-

Pepsi Free sets world markets

While Coca-Cola Co. puts its international marketing muscle behind the worldwide launch of Diet Coke, PepsiCo International is gearing up to introduce the first caffeine-free cola in many of the same markets.

According to Terry Fassburg, director of pr, PepsiCo International "is actively investigating the launch of Pepsi Free in developed markets where a large segment of consumers are health and fitness conscious." While not willing to name the targeted markets, Mr. Fassburg says PepsiCo is "looking at places where decaffeinated coffees, light beers and diet drinks have been successful."

Decaffeinated Pepsi Free, both regular and sugar-free (with aspartame), debuted in English Canada last November and, he said, "results there will serve as a bellwether for future international launches."

Those results already are encouraging, said PepsiCo's Canadian marketing director Arrol Simms. Pepsi Free, he said, has achieved 95% distribution in English Canada and won 2% of the entire Canadian soft-drink market (including Quebec) after six weeks in English markets only.

The sugar-free version of Pepsi Free already is claiming 25% of the Canadian diet segment, adds Mr. Simms, who feels the combination of sugar-free and caffeine-free will prove the real winner. "If you've got people who are concerned about their health," he says, "there is a high likelihood they will also be concerned about caffeine consumption. And if you have a product like Pepsi Free, which can give them both benefits, that's what they're going to choose." #—C.H.

Y&R a heavy investor in executive training

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

New York—When Ed Ney took over the helm of Young & Rubicam 11 years ago, he drew up a priority list that stressed vertical and horizontal growth.

Since he became chairman, the agency has added domestic and international outposts, including an affiliation with Dentsu, the largest advertising agency in the world. And there are the other capabilities, he added, ranging from medical care communications to pr to direct mail.

To keep on top of its growth, continue to turn out its own management talent pool and insure that all hands at Y&R's various new and old offices remain faithful to the Y&R modus operandi, the agency has found it necessary to create what could be called its own in-house college. In charge of this extensive program is 39-year-old senior vp Nick Rudd.

Today, Y&R annually invests at least $1 million in this management training program. While other agencies have their own forms of indoctrination, or seek to train neophytes who demonstrate promotability, no agency goes about the task as intensively as Y&R. The agency also makes the largest investment in terms of capital, manpower and man-hours. At other agencies, training tends to take place at lunch hour or after-five programs that stretch over a series of weeks or months. Y&R submerges its employes in its various training sessions.

There are 18 separate management development programs at Y&R, covering strategy, creative, print, broadcast, direct marketing, selling, lawful interviewing, performance appraisal, time management, writing and presentation skills.

The mission of training is "to assist Y&R managers in fulfilling staff potential and in improving product quality," Mr. Rudd said. "Training is not remedial," he continued. "It is making good people better and better people best. It is not taking people who are bad and making them okay."

One of the most grueling of the 18 courses available at Y&R is its Advertising Skills Workshop. Held twice a year, this course requires the Y&R executives to spend five and one-half weeks in a classroom, from 8:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. daily. It's one of the more intensive programs imaginable, and to select applicants Mr. Ney writes Y&R's 126 managers and "basically says, 'Give me your best and your brightest,'" Mr. Rudd said. Nominees are winnowed out by the individual agency's management, who ultimately send one name on to Mr. Rudd.

In turn, he constructs a heterogeneous group "representing the breadth of Y&R" in terms of geography, specialty and function. He also makes a conscious effort to insure the presence of women in the sessions. The classes run about 50% to 60% account people, with creative, financial, legal, production people comprising the remaining members.

Over the month and a half, students are addressed by representatives of all of Y&R's subsidiaries, referred to as "resources." For instance, someone from Sudler & Hennessey is there to discuss medical care advertising. Another representative is there from Wunderman, Ricotta & Kline to discuss direct-mail marketing. Yet another comes in from Y&R's Concepts Group to describe the company's new-product development capability. They are also taught the Y&R way of doing things, as well as key points in handling clients.

Agency chairman Ed Ney addresses opening session of a Young & Rubicam Advertising Skills Workshop in New York. Y&R says its program is one of the most extensive in the agency field.

Throughout the course, the students apply what they have learned to a case study, an example that is either real or is based on reality. In a recent course, the test case was a hypothetical Better for You food line from General Foods. Ultimately, students will make individual presentations based on what they've learned. There are no grades, no pass/fail.

The "students" stay in a midtown hotel with their own Y&R office picking up the tab for food and lodging. The program is designed to "expand a specialist's perspective into that of an advertising generalist," Mr. Rudd said. "They know these things already. I'm just providing them with a skeleton to hang things on."

Students tend to be in their late 20s or early 30s, with an average of two to four years experience at Y&R.

"It is not a case of the student knows nothing and the trainer knows everything," Mr. Rudd said. "The participant knows something, the trainer also knows something and the role of the facilitator is to assist the participant in arriving at a solution." Socrates would be right at home in a Y&R classroom.

"I am not learning new things, but I'm learning new ways of thinking about things," said Erick Van Hal of Y&R/Amsterdam, a recent student. Frank Armstrong, of Y&R's Montreal outpost, agreed.

Not only do the trainees come to Y&R headquarters here, but Y&R trainers take their show on the road.

"In general we attempt to provide services to the units of Y&R," Mr. Rudd said. For instance, say the London office decides it needs some fine honing of its presentation skills. Mr. Rudd is contacted and, after confirming the need, packs off a trainer for that skill workshop. "It is up to Y&R/London to get the people in the room," Mr. Rudd said.

The various training programs have evolved over the years. While day-after recall was the rage five years ago, today the emphasis is on consumer behavior. Mr. Rudd is now working with Jonas Wagner, vp-corporate marketing supervisor, on putting together a two-day "Whole Egg" workshop, designed to indoctrinate new Y&Rers in the "Whole Egg" dictum of the agency.

The training program also provides cassettes. In the third quarter of '82, cassettes were sent out covering a prospect profile, creativity, the Clio Awards and senior vp-creative director David Tree talking about "new wave" advertising. In that same quarter, in the USA, 41 employes took the performance appraisal and planning seminar; 29 took lawful interviewing, and 23 took the writing skills workshop.

"When we don't train we get into trouble," Mr. Rudd said, adding that in the mid-'70s, the company cut back. "We learned a big lesson. It caused us to skip a management generation and it really was a problem," he noted.

Mr. Rudd has been entrenched in training ever since he arrived at Y&R 11 years ago with an MBA from Columbia Business School. His first assignment was to rewrite the personnel policy manual. "From the beginning I was thinking about all of Y&R," as opposed to any individual discipline, Mr. Rudd noted. At that time, his training was a yearlong program dubbed "Executive Development Training." It consisted of rotating around the agency, spending time with people in all the various disciplines.

When Ed Ney decided that training was key to Y&R's success, he turned to Mr. Rudd to figure out the details.

"I have a bent for this stuff," Mr. Rudd said. "I enjoy communicating about it. I have the kind of mind that enjoys deducing the principle." When he looked to other agencies for management training models, he found the majority were primarily focused on orientation.

So he took on the roles of teacher, coordinator and administrator himself. Today, Mr. Rudd says, "Y&R managers are my clients. Their people are my accounts."#

Diet Coke's world launch

creased.

Yasunori Watanabe, PepsiCo Japan's director of marketing, added that Japanese women "don't like to show they are dieting in front of others," and that a diet drink must "stress its fashionableness in advertising in order to overcome this problem."

Other markets

Three other markets where Coke will have to build the diet market from scratch are France, Brazil and Sweden.

Of the three, Sweden holds the most potential since the total ban on cyclamates and the limited ban on saccharin will be alleviated by the February approval of aspartame by health officials.

Diet Coke is due in Sweden in May, probably with the name Coke Light, and a formula combining aspartame and a small amount of saccharin. Coke Sweden expects Ramlosa, Scandinavia's leading mineral water producer, initially to provide the major competition.

The main barrier to Diet Coke's entry in Brazil is a tough government regulation that maximum recommended consumption of the diet beverage clearly be stated on the label.

"You have to give maximum intake a day, not more than half a liter a day," said Coca-Cola Brazil's marketing director Jorge Giganti. "It's like a medicine. You can't launch it as a diet product."

Coke, however, hopes to get Diet Coke, Brazil's first diet drink since Tab bombed here a decade ago, approved by health and agriculture ministries without restrictions.

Finally in France, there is no chance of introducing Diet Coke because of stiff rules preventing the use of all artificial sweeteners (including aspartame), except through pharmacies. The country's powerful sugar beet interests so far have been successful in their fight to prevent France from conforming to EEC standards, which permit the use of artificial sweeteners.#

The saga of a fourth network . . .

By Jim Hammett

When the Independent Network News first aired on June 9, 1980, it had the makings of being a news media event in itself. It should have grabbed headlines, if not in the general media, at least in the trade press.

But it didn't.

Nine days earlier, Ted Turner launched Cable News Network and caught the attention of the general and trade press, as well as the banner, "the fourth network." Never mind that INN was being beamed by satellite to all but one of the top 20 major tv markets or that some of network tv's top advertisers were funding the effort the first year.

All that heralded the INN launch were a few posters and some introductory spots on the stations that would carry it. Even a short time after INN's launch, some viewers confused INN with Turner's CNN, because some of the independent stations carrying INN were included in the basic programing package cable companies offered their subscribers.

It's a little different now.

Today, some 80-plus stations carry the INN news broadcasts, and, according to its executives, INN's advertising stables have broadened "considerably."

Before INN's debut, independent stations offered a variety of approaches to news—some bordering on the comical—largely because of limited budgets and manpower.

Satellites and earth stations changed much of that, though, helping pave the way for a nonnetwork newscast that independent stations around the country could use as their own news program.

John Corporan, INN senior vp-news and general manager, and the man credited with the INN idea, said the cost of distributing INN (or any newscast like it) by American Telegraph & Telephone lines (the alternative) would have been too prohibitive for many INN "affiliates" had the independents not led the way in putting up earth stations to receive programing.

Space-age technology aside, the idea of a national nonnetwork newscast had been tossed around at New York independent tv station WPIX as far back as the early 1970s, according to Mr. Corporan. INN is a separate division of WPIX, which is owned by the Tribune Co.

"Originally," he said, "we went to the Independent Television News Assn. [ITNA] with the idea." At that time, he said ITNA provided daily news feeds to some 20 independent stations, via satellite, and WPIX wanted to use some of ITNA's resources as part of the newscast.

But ITNA turned down the request because other independents in the larger markets were taking the ITNA news feeds and, because only one station in each market could take the proposed newscast, other stations would have been left out in the cold. That, in turn, hindered efforts to get the necessary advertising support to launch such a project.

ITNA's rejection, however, was only a temporary setback. "We knew we were going to have to go it alone," he said, "so we first did a pilot of the newscast with WPIX anchors Steve Bosh and Pat Harper." That broadcast was shown to station managers and potential advertisers.

Mr. Corporan said he wasn't pleased with the initial effort, so INN made a second pilot with a different format, adding Bill Jorgensen to the anchor team. This proved to be more to his liking. "We knew we had something we could go to a few independents and major advertisers with to ask for their support," Mr. Corporan said.

To start with, there would have to be station commitment so that a total of tv household numbers could be used in the effort to get advertising support, he said.

Also, the stations needed to commit themselves with the newscast for a year. "We promised to provide them with five newscasts a week; fed via satellite at 9:30 p.m. ET and gave the stations three minutes in each newscast to sell to local advertisers—that against the three minutes we sold to national advertisers."

In turn the stations could use the telecasts as they wished—preceding or after their own newscasts, or as a station's only newscast. "We even provide a three-minute window at the end of each newscast for those stations on limited budgets to use to air local headlines. No one was told how to use it," Mr. Corporan said.

In addition, INN provided, as it does now, the promotional efforts—through posters and on-air spots—again to be used by the "affiliates" as they wish.

From a news product standpoint, the New York staff, a staff set up in Washington and the affiliates themselves provide much of the material for each telecast. International news comes in via news wire services. The setup, according to Mr. Corporan, helps give the newscast credibility and makes INN a solid competitor, if not alternative, to network news.

He believes INN offers network quality newscasts, despite some criticism that it is not up to network par. "There is just so much that can be done in 30 minutes," he said. The amount of money the networks are able to put into their newscasts cannot improve what 30 minutes will allow, he argued.

And to Mr. Corporan, the bottom line tells the whole story, "We're successful because we are profitable." Although the network won't disclose figures, it does indicate that it started with a budget of $6 million and since then has more than doubled.

With nearly twice the number of stations INN set out to win as charter "affiliates," advertisers were sought to fund the operation the first year.

Prime-time airing was to be-

. . . making headway and headlines

In television's recent entertainment programing history, the adage "Success breeds success" has been rewritten somewhat. In this medium, it's more like "Success breeds spinoffs."

Tv news programing is no different, especially for Independent Network News, the 2½-year-old product of New York independent tv station WPIX, owned by the Tribune Co. From INN's success has grown three other news programs, which, according to John Corporan, is carried by 126 "affiliate" independent stations across the country.

In October, 1981, when INN was a year old, WPIX launched "Midday," a noontime newscast not too unlike its nighttime INN newscast counterpart. "Midday's" development grew out of a situation much like that of INN. Explained Mr. Corporan, "Many of these independent station 'affiliates' have neither the manpower nor budget to put on a noontime news program that handles overnight or early morning news development. This is what it's for."

Of the three INN spinoffs—the other two are "From the Editor's Desk" and "The Wall Street Journal Report"—"Midday" is probably the most successful in terms of the number of stations that carry it—a number that nearly matches that of INN's 83. As with the "parent" program, a total of six minutes of commercial airtime—divided equally between INN and the affiliate—is provided in the 30-minute broadcast. And, as with INN, a three-minute window is added to the end of the broadcast for affiliates to use to air local news headlines if they don't put on their own local news broadcast. "Midday" is fed to affiliates at 11:30 a.m. ET.

INN also started in October, 1981, "From the Editor's Desk," a question and answer news program akin to "Meet the Press" and "Face the Nation."

"Many of the station managers at affiliates that carry our broadcasts suggested we do such a program because we had the resources to get name personalities to come in and face editors from major news organizations." Mr. Corporan said. Unlike its network counterparts, "From the Editor's Desk" is aired at night, generally on Sunday evening after prime time and is carried by about half of INN's affiliates. Commercial airtime is sold in a manner similar to that of INN broadcasts and "Midday."

What Mr. Corporan is the most excited about nowadays is the third spinoff, "The Wall Street Journal Report," a newscast he describes as "a review of the week's significant business and financial news."

Launched in October of 1982, the 30-minute broadcast airs on the weekend varying from market to market and draws much of its content and resources from the Wall Street Journal, with INN providing the production staff. "It's the only such program on television now," he claimed, "and we believe it will be very successful." As of now, about 22 stations across the country, mostly in the larger urban areas, carry it.

So what looms ahead? "I don't know what will be next," Mr. Corporan said, "We are counter-programed as it is and I don't know of any other slots we can fill. I don't think we are going to compete with the networks from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. They would swallow us alive." —J.H.

Interference at the movies?

Even though local television station profits continue to be among the strongest of any industry—with record prices being paid for stations, attesting to the ongoing prosperity of local broadcasting—the future picture is filled with potential interference and uncertainty.

Stations, especially independents, are worried that the primary sources of programing—their lifeblood—are in jeopardy. The networks' push to repeal the Federal Communications Commission's financial interest rule threatens to curtail local stations' current access to valuable off-network programing.

First-run syndication programing remains a high-risk venture with only a few program suppliers besides Paramount the only really viable players.

Finally, stations fear that pay-cable services such as Home Box Office, Showtime and The Movie Channel are eroding the performances of current movies and seriously threatening the availability of the future product. While there has been much said and written about the financial interest rules and first-run programing, pay tv's impact on local movies in syndication has become a heated topic of discussion. Most stations view pay tv as another link in the distribution process. Not too long ago, a station could buy rights to a movie after it had played at theaters and on network tv.

Now there is another tier: Movies are sold to the pay channels, which drives up prices and draws away audiences. Everything a station manager hears indicates pay tv is a threat to his business. Even the networks appear to be intimidated by the pay services and are pulling back from movies.

In fact, a positive future for movies in local broadcasting is actually being enhanced by the networks' reaction to the presence of pay tv. The networks are buying fewer movies and taking fewer runs, which is amazing considering that if the pay-tv channels proved anything, it is that Americans have a healthy appetite for movies. So how can the networks relinquish their most valuable programing? Why give up on movies when the network rating declines have not been as great as, for example, the declines for situation comedies or drama series? Recently, NBC would not allow HBO to outbid it for the rights to the series "Taxi," yet it won't bid competitively for movies.

With all of this negative reinforcement, many station managers find themselves in the "me too" syndrome: The other guy is worried so I should be too. There is only one thing wrong with this line of thought—it isn't based on reality.

While pay tv is changing the economics of movie syndication to the point that many syndicators are having difficulty justifying the sale of their film properties to stations at all, the stations should not passively give up on movies. To back away from this proven product and follow in the footsteps of the three networks is absolutely foolhardy. Abandoning movies because their impact might be dissipated by their exposure on pay tv is, quite simply, unnecessary panic.

To begin with, movies are still performing well for local stations—especially independents. Ratings across the country are higher this year than in the past as stations continue to learn how to better schedule their movie packages and develop more effective promotions.

Stations are allowing themselves to become victims of media hype over the exposure problem on the pay channels without investigating the facts. The entire pay-tv universe is approximately 20 million subscribers, with HBO and Cinemax taking the lion's share and The Movie Channel and Showtime dividing up most of the rest.

However, because there is a high duplication factor in pay services, the actual number of different pay-tv households is estimated to be closer to the 12 million or 13 million level. Therefore, a movie running on network tv only delivering a 15 to 20 rating would reach more homes than the entire "real" pay-tv universe. In addition no movie ever reaches the potential audience of a pay channel.

Bearing this in mind, isn't it unusual that when a syndicator offers to a station a movie that had three network runs instead of five, he gets little additional attention for this property? However, if that same syndicator offers a movie that had not been sold to pay tv, he would be much more successful in clearing the title and in generating more dollars for it from the station. As noted, the facts simply do not support this emotional reaction on the part of the stations.

Another thought to bear in mind is that while the pay-tv universe may be increasing, the total potential audience that can be exposed to a movie will be shrinking as the pay services inevitably move closer to title exclusivity. HBO has been saying privately that within 18 months to two years, all of its movies will be exclusive to its own service.

When HBO's exclusivity becomes fact, the potential pay-tv audience for any one particular title—even taking into consideration future growth—will be far less than the current 20 million subscriber universe.

Another factor will be that for independent and affiliated stations alike, there will be less exposure for syndicated movies—so these titles will be fresher to their viewers.

Local stations, through better scheduling and promotion, can still gain the maximum value from movies. To be sure, this reality will be played out in a different economic framework.

At Paramount, we have begun offering our latest movie package—Portfolio X—on a three-year license term instead of the traditional five- to seven-year term. Given the lucrativeness of selling to pay tv, a movie syndicator has no alternative.

The pay channels can pay more for the rights to a title they will own for only six months to a year than a local station can pay for a title they traditionally owned for five to seven years.

Paramount developed the shortened licensing period for one main reason: We want to keep the syndication marketplace alive for movies. If stations lose their access to film programing—which for independents are often the greatest source for revenues—and are then hit by the repeal of the FCC financial interest rule at a time when fewer hit series are coming off-network, the impact on local broadcasting could be devastating.

Our position is to sell to pay tv and to syndication, however, for a shorter license period. The solution will probably cost us money as we could make more just selling to pay tv, but we feel a stand needs to be taken.

We also believe, and our research substantiates, that stations do not need the full seven-year term. Station usage of movies during the last years of its contract tends to decline drastically. At the same time that we are asking stations to pay the same or even higher rates for the shortened contract, we are willing to allow them more runs.

With proper scheduling and usage, a station can get more runs from a movie in less time than is currently the case. Stations realize that duplication of audiences in different dayparts is often very low. Showing a movie in daytime in July would probably not duplicate much of the audience that watched it the previous June during prime time.

The reaction from stations to the Paramount plan has been very positive, although some stations do not want to be the first to break with the old way of conducting business. Others are more aggressive and realize Paramount is trying to be a realistic partner in the new marketplace.

Still others are, as always, slow to respond and will come around only when the industry pulls them along. Stations have to stop reacting emotionally to the threat of pay cable.

They cannot afford to walk away from movies unless they are also willing to walk away from the millions of loyal movie viewers that will be forced to turn to pay tv to satisfy their film appetites. ▬ come a key to selling advertising, ad manager John McGowan said. Originally, he sought support from a handful—about five—of major advertisers.

"I guess we started out like Ted Turner—asking a few select advertisers to fund us for a year. But we soon learned we could sell airtime like the networks. We sold out completely [Mobil, Citicorp, Shearson-American Express were among the first] that first year. We then expanded the newscasts to seven days a week, instead of the initial five," he said.

Of course, he acknowledged, it didn't start as easy as all that. "It was a new idea, and people are reluctant to accept a new idea. So we first had to be priced competitively [today averaging $6,000 per 30-second spot]. Matter of fact, everything we offered the advertisers the networks offered, except for one thing—the time slot."

Mr. McGowan said he believed it should be positioned against the networks, specifically, for playback in the last hour of prime time.

"It's a different daypart," he said. "We knew we could reach more people that way—the viewers that won't stay up later for the news."

Only a few air the newscast at a later hour, according to station executives.

When questioned about the newscasts ratings against network prime-time shows, Mr. McGowan said he plays it down. Arbitron showed a 2% rating on a local basis.

"Rating size is an area we have tried to overcome," he said. That, to a large extent, because not all stations air it at the same time.

While most do put the telecast on in the last hour of prime time, some of those stations put it in the first half of the hour, while others place it in the last half of the hour. Stations on the West Coast tend to air it earlier, since the news feed for them is at 6:30 p.m. and aired generally by 7 p.m., John Corporan said.

Nielsen Television Index (NTI) does do a weekly survey of syndicated occasional network programing, which INN compiles with NTI into a special annual. Because, the study is only done once a year, latest available figures, Mr. McGowan said, are for February, 1982.

Mr. McGowan said INN reaches 75% of the U.S. tv market. Its average weekly cumulative audience in its coverage area is 14.6%, or 9.5% of total U.S. tv households. A four-week cume (unduplicated audience) with its coverage is 34.5%, according to the NTI survey, and 22.4% of the total U.S. tv households.

By way of comparison, ABC's "Nightline" reaches 43.7% of total U.S. tv households in its time slot, ABC "World News Tonight" reaches 48.8%, NBC's "Nightly News" reaches 49.3% and CBS' "Evening News" reaches 52.8%, the NTI survey shows.

In real numbers, the survey shows INN's four-week cumulative audience of 18.2 million U.S. tv households; "Nightline," 35.6 million; "World News Tonight," 39.7 million; "Nightly News," 40.1 million; and "Evening News," 43 million.

In addition, the executives said, INN is seen in 44 other markets because most of the INN affiliates are heavily imported by cable systems.

With the recent addition of a few more affiliates, INN reports 83 stations on its list. But that isn't all it claims. According to Mr. Corporan and Mr. McGowan, "We are the fourth network." ▬

Agency income nears $6 billion in 1982

Y&R holds top spot, Ted Bates takes over second from J. Walter Thompson

A national economy chilled by recession and overseas operations plagued by unfavorable currency exchange rates failed to stop the U.S. advertising industry from setting new records in 1982 as gross income rose to $5.88 billion on billings of $39.2 billion.

According to the 39th compilation of agency data by ADVERTISING AGE, last year's gross income was 12.2% above the $5.24 billion reported by 838 agencies in the survey a year ago. In posting a new income mark, the 822 agencies participating in the latest survey saw billings rise 10% over the previous year's record of $35.6 billion.

Last year's income and billings both were more than double 1977's gross income of $2.86 billion and billings of $19.4 billion.

The following five-year summary of gross income charts both the pace of industry growth and the recession's effect: 1978, $3.46 billion gross (up 20%); 1979, $4.10 billion (up 18.5%); 1980, $4.67 billion (up 13.5%); 1981, $5.24 billion (up 12.2%), and 1982, $5.88 billion (up 12.2%).

A total of 52 agencies in the current survey had gross income of more than $15 million last year. The combined gross income and billings of the 52 shops was $4,587,145,000 and on billings of $31,339,524,000, respectively. There were 72 agencies in the $5 million to $15 million category, whose combined gross income was $454,173,617 on billings of $3,209,707,860; 304 agencies in the $1 million to $5 million category, whose combined gross income was $646,419,123 on billings of $3,649,134,530, and 394 agencies in the under $1 million classification, whose combined gross income was $191,722,576 on billings of $1,017,644,760.

Young & Rubicam remained atop the worldwide income rankings for the third consecutive year. The giant agency, whose subsidiaries include Marsteller Inc., Wunderman, Ricotta & Kline and Sudler & Hennessey, reported gross income of $376.6 million on billings of $2.51 billion. In 1981, Y&R and subsidiaries had income of $349.9 million on estimated billings of $2.33 billion.

Ted Bates Worldwide wrested the No. 2 spot in the 1982 income rankings from J. Walter Thompson Co.

Agency of the Year O&M livens up—again

By Joseph M. Winski

In "Confessions of an Advertising Man" David Ogilvy talks about the life cycle of an advertising agency.

It is born, invariably of men with creative fires in their bellies. It gets accounts from "soft old agencies." It does great work.

It prospers. It grows large. Its momentum becomes spent; dullness and dry rot set in. Then "the emphasis shifts to collateral services, to conceal the agency's creative bankruptcy."

Mr. Ogilvy wrote that in 1963. His agency—then known as Ogilvy, Benson & Mather, today as Ogilvy & Mather International—was 15 years old at the time, and nowhere near creative bankruptcy. Indeed, Mr. Ogilvy observed, it only recently had begun to redress a "lopsided reputation for creativity" by hiring a top executive from Benton & Bowles, "widely regarded as the best of all agencies in the marketing area."

For a while, the agency maintained the delicate balance between creative and business operations. But then what David Ogilvy had warned about began to happen to his own agency: The emphasis shifted markedly toward account management.

In the mid-1970s, O&M surveys of advertising clients of New York's 15 largest agencies showed repeatedly that Ogilvy was regarded as a top-notch strategic agency that was turning out workmanlike, but for the most part uninspired, advertising.

An accomplished young admaker named Curvin O'Rielly went to work at Ogilvy and lasted about three months.

"They were functioning like a bank," Mr. O'Rielly recalls. "Ogilvy was a large financial institution that was doing dull and predictable work."

David Ogilvy, who at 71 is still the agency's international creative head, would not have that. In speeches, missives from his castle in France and biting comments scribbled on Ogilvy ads, he grabbed his agency by the scruff and shook it from its lethargy, demanding a return to creative glory. Management—led by former Ogilvy & Mather International chief executive Jock Elliott and his successor, current ceo William Phillips—got the message.

Freshening a long-running campaign, Tom Landry was the 56th personality to ask "Do you know me?"

They imported a jaunty iconoclast named Norman Berry from London to be creative director of the New York office. They made Kenneth Roman, a veteran account executive attuned to the ways and wants of creative types, president of Ogilvy & Mather USA. In a move that has proved as key as any, they told a restless perfectionist named Hal Riney to set up an O&M office anywhere he wanted.

According to Mr. Ogilvy, selling should be done with taste: "The housewife is not a moron, she is your wife."

The ads got perceptively better. Awards rolled in, and in an agency survey last April of clients of the top New York agencies, Ogilvy & Mather ranked No. 1 in creativity for the first time. It repeated the performance in September.

Mr. O'Rielly, who could stand just a few months at Ogilvy five years before, came back last May as creative head of Ogilvy's Chicago office. A veteran of such acclaimed creative shops as Ally & Gargano and Young & Rubicam, Mr. O'Rielly says flatly that "Ogilvy & Mather is doing the best work in all of advertising today. Suddenly the renaissance is taking place."

Hal Riney and O&M's San Francisco office produced this award-winning campaign for California First Bank.

There is considerable agreement in the industry about that, and the assessment is shared by the editors of ADVERTISING AGE, who have named Ogilvy & Mather Agency of the Year for 1982.

In the last few years, Ogilvy & Mather's hallmarks have become its consistency—over time, across its various offices, across clients—and its balance. The agency not only has achieved again that rare equanimity of creative and business excellence, but balance within its advertising as well. It is as adept with the emotional appeal—as in O&M San Francisco's subtly wry Henry Weinhard's Private Reserve spots or its fabled "Billy Ball" campaign for the Oakland A's baseball team—as it is with flat-out logic—as in the Chicago office's work for the Wagner Power Painter, which won a $10,000 1982 David Ogilvy award given for campaigns that produce the best sales results.

O&M won American Bell, one of 1982's most coveted accounts, with estimated billings of $40 million.

As befits an agency nurtured from birth by David Ogilvy's gracefully elegant prose, O&M today may be the country's premier print agency. Its Paco Rabanne magazine ads, with frankly sexual copy that is said to have made Mr. Ogilvy blush, won the Magazine Publishers Assn.'s first Stephen E. Kelley award for magazine advertising last year; its classic, long-copy work for Peugeot was a runner-up.

This year, three Ogilvy campaigns—for International Paper, Pepperidge Farm cookies and Aramco Services (a recruitment campaign)—were among the 24 semi-finalists in the Kelley competition; only one other agency had as many. The International Paper effort, which won the award, resulted in 10 million reprint requests. The company says it still receives a thousand requests daily for the "printed word" campaign on improving literacy skills.

O&M: Agency of the Year

Ogilvy has excelled at keeping long-running campaigns fresh, a task that Mr. Berry, the New York creative director, calls the "most important single thing in any advertising work." The latest example is the American Express commercial featuring Dallas Cowboy coach Tom Landry in outlandish cowboy gear. Mr. Landry was the 56th personality to ask "Do you know me?" in the American Express campaign, which began in 1974 and has been a constant Ogilvy bright spot.

The Landry commercial is one of several recent Ogilvy efforts that has entered the public vernacular. Another is the "Kids fly free" TWA commercial in which youngsters say, with some confusion, where they'd like to go on vacation. The agency's Smith Barney commercials with actor John Houseman and Karl Malden's spots for American Express Travelers Cheques long ago provided material for Johnny Carson monologs, as well as a boost in business for both advertisers.

Ogilvy has handled new products with equal flair. Last year's work for Avon's Fantasque helped make it the most successful perfume launch in U.S. history, according to Graham Phillips, managing director of O&M New York. He says advertising for Le Menu, a new Swanson frozen entree, caused such heavy demand that Swanson couldn't keep up; and that work for Pepperidge Farm's Vegetables 'n Pastry helped create "a $60 million-to-$70 million business out of thin air."

And last year—technically just after midnight this year—Ogilvy helped launch not a new product, but a new company, American Bell. Ogilvy won American Bell's Advanced Information Systems account, one of last year's most coveted, after a series of four presentations, including the showing of speculative creative work.

"The advertising that is running today is the advertising we presented," Mr. Phillips notes; it clinched, he says, what is the agency's most important piece of new business since it landed TWA in 1979, and one that is expected to grow rapidly from this year's estimated billings of $40 million.

Ogilvy New York beat out N W Ayer, Ketchum Communications and Campbell-Ewald for the account by presenting case histories of Ogilvy work that spoke to the problems American Bell would face. Among them were campaigns for Cessna Aircraft, which demonstrated Ogilvy's experience in selling expensive equipment to corporations; Nimslo 3-D cameras, to show how to sell a new technical product (for Nimslo, Ogilvy produced commercials that simulated the 3-D effect); TWA, to show how to operate in a deregulated environment, and Owens-Corning, to show how to reach a broad, but segmented market.

Also among the Ogilvy weapons in its presentations was a wall-to-wall foldout detailing the agency's comprehensive work for American Express, ranging from tv commercials customized for local markets to last year's 95 million direct-mail pieces for credit cards alone. Direct mail and will play an important role in the AIS campaign.

In my experience, there are five kinds of Creative Director:

1. Sound on strategy, dull on execution.
2. Good managers who don't make waves...and don't produce brilliant campaigns either.
3. Duds.
4. The genius who is a lousy leader.
5. TRUMPETER SWANS who combine personal genius with inspiring leadership.

David Ogilvy

In 1963, David Ogilvy wrote, "I still write occasional advertisements myself, to remind my brigade of copywriters that my hand has lost its cunning." Nearly 20 years later, he is still at it. Shown is an ad Mr. Ogilvy wrote for the June 11, 1982, issue of Campaign magazine.

O&M New York last year continued to erase the memory of former Maxwell House spokeswoman "Cora"—considered by some an eminently erasable copy of Folger's "Mrs. Olsen"—with its warm "Feelings" campaign, featuring the singing of Ray Charles. Ogilvy says the commercials have boosted sales and improved attitudes toward coffee among the younger target audience.

TWA's Ambassador Class campaign aimed at business travelers, in which Wilt Chamberlain and Kareem Abdul-Jabbar match frames, continued to be one of the agency's most successful campaigns, according to Mr. Roman. "They've increased their share, they've increased their load factor," he says. "In a deregulated environment, they're going to be a survivor."

There was good work from the outposts as well last year. A commercial for California First Bank by Hal Riney and his San Francisco office was the only U.S. effort to win a Cannes Film Festival award. The Henry Weinhard's Private Reserve campaign won the best-of-show award in tv advertising at the International Film & TV Festival in New York in November. All told, the office's awards listing ran to six typed pages.

Mr. Riney also came up with the signature line—"All the best"—and the beautifully photographed commercials that virtually stole the Gallo premium wines account from NH&S/USA. For good measure, Mr. Riney was the subject of the first story in Advertising Age Magazine's "Admakers" series (April 26).

How to write with style

INTERNATIONAL PAPER COMPANY

International Paper has sent out 10 million reprints from its Ogilvy-developed "printed word" campaign.

The Los Angeles office, under creative director John Carter, a 1979 import from a Canadian creative consulting company, continued its well received work for Mattel Inc. Mattel's rapid increase in ad spending has pushed it ahead of General Foods as Ogilvy's biggest account. O&M Houston was named that city's agency of the year for the third straight year, and O&M Atlanta last month won the Atlanta Ad Club's 1982 best-in-show award for a consumer magazine campaign for Faucett Peruvian Airlines.

O&M Chicago broke a tough, attention-getting comparative campaign for new client Parker Pen.

To round off what has to be considered last year's virtuoso performance, Ogilvy also produced 2,200 individual American Express radio spots featuring local restaurateurs, mailed out its one billionth Shell Answer Man booklet, orchestrated a high-profile credit card promotion that made Shell Oil No. 1 in oil-company credit cards outstanding and helped the Knoxville World's Fair reach its once improbable goal of 11 million in attendance.

There were some disappointments. The sluggish economy caused the publicly owned agency's net income for the year to decline by 10% to $14.8 million from $16.5 million. It lost the Royal Crown Cola account, despite some arresting new-wave commercials much admired at Ogilvy and elsewhere. "It was not the creative work that lost that account," Mr. Berry says. "It was lovely work in an extremely difficult category where you are outspent 40 to 1; and the fact that we lost the business makes me no less proud of that advertising." The agency also was beaten in creative shootouts for the Hallmark account—despite a visit to Hallmark by David Ogilvy—and for the Sears corporate merchandising account. •

When Mr. Roman became president of Ogilvy & Mather U.S. in 1979, he said his primary objective was to see Ogilvy become "the hot creative agency." He says Ogilvy has become just that, and he gives a lot of the credit to Mr. Berry, who has transformed O&M New York into the role model that an agency's flagship office ideally should be.

A native Londoner with a craggy Peter O'Toole handsomeness, Mr. Berry says he was "inadvertently" acquired by Ogilvy when it bought out an agency that had merged with an agency he co-owned. His father, ex-wife, ex-father-in-law and daughter all did, or are doing, time in advertising, Mr. Berry says.

He arrived in New York in 1979 in his round-collared "Dr. Zhivago"-inspired shirts (custom made at Turnbull & Asser in London, and having the chief virtue for Mr. Berry of not accommodating neckties), politely declined to carpet his office in Ogilvy red and immediately began espousing some deeply felt notions about being, as the agency's founder would put it, "an advertising agent."

"The real test of an advertising agency," Mr. Berry says, "is whether it does outstandingly good work across all its clients. It is the depth of originality, of creativity, that I'm interested in. There are a lot of agencies who say, 'Well, let's have the showcase accounts and then the other.' I think there is something essentially immoral about the idea that you have accounts on which you do great creative work and accounts on which you just crank out the sausage.

"I'd take as much pride—indeed, more—if one could do work for, say, a detergent that within its category is perceived by the industry to be outstanding creative work. I'd rather do that than lots of boutique stuff. Anybody can do that.

"What enormous pleasure I have, to give you an example, in Huggies, for Kimberly-Clark, a wildly successful brand. It is in against P&G, Luvs and all that. It is essentially a parity product, but it is doing marvelously well. The work is demonstrably more original, more to do with people, less to do with formula."

Mr. Berry says Ogilvy has no accounts on which it is, in effect, turning the handle; it is forbidden. "To require, and say, to your staff that what you are looking for is outstandingly original, relevant creative work, and then when it comes to the crunch to say, 'Well, we really only mean that on some of the accounts,' is to create, and deservedly so, a cynicism amongst your own staff. You then get the work that you deserve."

He continues: "There's a marvelous quote from Alex Kroll [president of Young & Rubicam] on this debate over how the U.S. lost its leadership in advertising. And his answer was, 'We stopped trying to have it great and decided to have it on Tuesday.' That's what I'm particularly proud of at Ogilvy—one has not given up on having it great."

Ogilvy & Mather, which this year celebrates its 35th birthday, had billings of $2.15 billion last year (up 11%), including $1.18 billion in the U.S. (up

Income nears $6 billion

Bates surged from fifth to second place as a result of its 1982 acquisition of William Esty Co., the largest transaction in agency history.

Bates' total gross income was $356.1 million in 1982 on billings of $2.37 billion.

Thompson, the largest subsidiary of JWT Group, a holding company formed in June, 1980, reported gross income of $347.1 billion in 1982 on billings of $2.31 billion. Included in Thompson's figures are the billings and income of four subsidiaries: JWT USA, Thompson Recruitment, Brouillard Communications and Deltakos. The foregoing JWT units, coupled with other subsidiaries operating within the JWT Group, gave the parent company gross income of $433.5 million on 1982 revenues of $2.89 billion.

Other units within JWT Group include Hill & Knowlton, the world's largest public relations agency; Euro-Advertising International; Lord, Geller, Federico, Einstein; Survival Anglia, and Simmons Marketing Research Bureau.

JWT Group in 1982 was affected by costs associated with the closing of its scandal-ridden JWT Syndication unit, recruitment advertising losses, currency losses from the Mexican and Argentine devaluations and higher tax rates.

In view of Y&R's large subsidiary family, as well as the magnitude of the Bates/Esty merger, ADVERTISING AGE last year undertook a review of its long-standing policy that excludes holding companies like JWT Group and Interpublic Group of Cos. from any ranking of agencies.

AA concluded that JWT Group and Interpublic are simply not advertising agencies. In addition, unlike other large agency families or "quasi-holding companies," both have stressed the separate identities and independence of their agency networks, e.g., J. Walter Thompson Co. and sister unit, E-A International.

(For the first time, brief profiles of Interpublic and JWT Group appear in the "gross income over $15 million" section.)

Interpublic Group of Cos. reported 1982 gross income of $541.7 million on billings of $3.29 billion. Its units include McCann-Erickson Worldwide; Campbell-Ewald Worldwide, and SSC&B: Lintas Worldwide.

Young & Rubicam, Bates and Thompson were followed in worldwide gross income by Ogilvy & Mather ($315 million); McCann-Erickson Worldwide ($276.1 million); BBDO International ($238.3 million); Leo Burnett Co. ($221.2 million); Saatchi & Saatchi Compton ($186.5 million); Foote, Cone & Belding ($178.1 million), and Doyle Dane Bernbach ($175.9 million).

In terms of U.S. income, Y&R again was in the top spot with a total of $246.7 million. It was followed by Bates, $233.4 million; O&M, $176.9 million; Thompson, $167.2 million; BBDO, $155 million; Burnett, $136 million; Doyle Dane Bernbach, $129 million; FCB, $126.8 million; Grey Advertising, $109 million, and Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, $86.4 million.

This is the seventh year that AA has ranked agencies by gross income rather than billings. The change was made because most agencies recognize gross income as a more meaningful measure.

AA rejected income reports of 53 agencies for lack of information or supplying obviously erroneous data. In addition, the U.S. Postal Service returned 31 questionnaires stamped "addressee unknown."

Comparative tables of agency figures begin on Page 10.

U.S. Agency Income Profiles

How the competitors fared in 1982

A comprehensive view of the agency business begins on this page, as Advertising Age presents profiles of U.S. agencies and their gross income in 1982 and 1981, billings, accounts won and lost, media mix, top personnel, number of employes and phone numbers. The agency profiles are arranged alphabetically by income groups. The first group comprises agencies that recorded gross income of more than $15 million in 1982.

Portraits and Portfolios

We asked a group of agencies to submit a statement of philosophy that guides them in creating advertising for their clients and to include a few ads that support their philosophy.

We also talked to a few people behind the scenes of creative departments around the country—some names may be familiar to you, and some you may not have heard of.

These people have their own ideas about creativity, and the advertising they produce takes on a special personality.

Throughout this issue, we'll present these portraits and portfolios, beginning with a mix of color ads from various agencies on this page.

How we pick the Agency of the Year

The process of sorting through the serious contenders for the ADVERTISING AGE Agency of the Year award begins in earnest in January each year, when nominations are requested and submitted to the editors by editorial staff members from all AD AGE bureaus.

Staff nominations, of course, result from the constant monitoring of the advertising scene throughout the preceding year as this publication's reporters and editors go about their news coverage tasks. Compelling print and electronic commercials and advertisements are noted as they appear during the year; news and feature stories that might be relevant to the selection process are filed for future reference.

While primary emphasis is put on the nominations and opinions of staff members, careful consideration also is given to the many candidacies that are advanced by hopeful agencies themselves. Every effort is made to ensure that a serious potential contender isn't overlooked in the screening process.

The single common denominator in all of these deliberations—and a fact sometimes misunderstood by agency executives—is that the editors are looking for pure creative spark (see the accompanying story for discussion of the criteria). The creative approaches—energy, freshness, sharpness of the product or service's sales message, quality of production values, casting, direction—are the elements that must carry the day. Underlying all that, of course, is the success of that creative work for the final judge, the client.

The qualities that brought Ogilvy & Mather the designation as this year's ADVERTISING AGE Agency of the Year are discussed in the story beginning on P.1.

Among other finalists this year, a clear runnerup emerged as a worthy competitor to O&M for the honor: Lord, Geller, Federico, Einstein. This agency was a challenger primarily because of what the committee judged to be one of the best campaigns of 1982: The Charlie Chaplin look-alike ads for the IBM Personal Computer but, after intensive debate, the editors concluded that the depth of O&M's work gave it an edge in the 1982 competition.

Others agencies reaching the semifinal round of judging this year, in alphabetical order, included BBDO International; The Bloom Cos.; Geer, Dubois; NH&S/USA, and Young & Rubicam.

12%). As such things go, that is rapid growth. J. Walter Thompson Co. and Young & Rubicam, the two largest agencies in total billings, are 134 and 60 years old, respectively. Ted Bates & Co., which beat out Ogilvy for the No. 3 spot last year, partly by virtue of recent acquisitions, is eight years older.

Most of Ogilvy's growth has come from clients with whom it has patiently won favor, often starting with a single product. It began with just Maxwell House in 1960 and now bills more than $100 million for General Foods in 19 countries. It almost turned down the American Express account because the initial business was so small; American Express also bills more than $100 million today, in 26 countries.

And Ogilvy was the agency that ushered Hershey Foods into the world of advertising in 1969; today Hershey is one of the agency's major accounts.

All this, present agency executives say, is tribute to Mr. Ogilvy's insistence from the outset that the agency take the long view and that it conduct "first-class business in a first-class way." To assure this, Mr. Ogilvy has never been shy about putting the "rules" of advertising in writing, under such rubrics as "Magic Lanterns," and insisting that they be followed.

In "Confessions," for example, he compiled "11 commandments which you must obey if you work at my agency." Ogilvy no doubt remains the unchallenged industry leader in in-house publications and intramural speechmaking. Principal among Mr. Ogilvy's admonitions are these: The purpose of advertising is to sell. Selling should be done with taste. ("The housewife is not a moron; she is your wife," Mr. Ogilvy repeatedly has reminded his people.) It is vital to give the product advertised "the kind of indestructible image which is the only thing that can make your brand part of the fabric of American life."

"It still starts from David," says Mr. Roman, O&M U.S. president. "He writes down his 'principles of management.' He says we want gentlemen with brains. He orders us to avoid office politics, to behave civilly with each other. This company is very much the lengthened shadow of one man. I remember once he gave us these Russian dolls, the kind that have a bunch of smaller dolls nested inside larger ones. And inside the smallest doll it said—and I don't think anybody around here has forgotten it—'Always hire people who are bigger than you are—and in time we'll be a company of giants.' "

Criteria for selection

ADVERTISING AGE'S annual selection of Agency of the Year is based on evaluations by a committee of the publication's editors of the creative product of the nominated agencies.

In concentrating on an agency's creative effort, the editors look at copy, creative strategies, merchandising, media planning and research and related factors. In any given year, a number of agencies may achieve considerable success in their business operations for reasons not related directly to their creative achievements. But because of the criteria used in the Agency of the Year selection, these kinds of success stories don't necessarily qualify an agency for consideration.

Agencies vary in size, scope, management orientation and organizational achievement. Because of these differences, ADVERTISING AGE, in establishing this annual competition, has felt that any evaluation of this sort should focus entirely on ads, their relationship to contemporary market dynamics and their effect on sales. Advertising campaigns—an agency's end product—thus represent a universal denominator that provides for broad eligibility for selection as Agency of the Year, opening the competition to agencies of all types and sizes.

While it follows that business successes will result from outstanding creative efforts, it is the latter that forms the basis for consideration for this award.

If George Washington Could Have Used AAR...

He would have been able to select the best advertising, public relations and sales promotion agencies with confidentiality and efficiency.

But AAR didn't begin helping image builders choose the right agencies for their needs until 1975. Since that time hundreds of businesses in the United States, the United Kingdom and France have used AAR as a confidential, efficient way to select agencies from among many of the world's most prestigious communications organizations.

By using the Advertising Agency Register or its sister services the Public Relations Register and Sales Promotion Register, you can review outside agencies based upon your specific criteria. . . all accomplished in complete confidence.

In each case these reviews consist of an audio-visual presentation of no more than 10 minutes in length along with documents clearly describing agency history and special areas of professional expertise.

So if you're thinking of selecting an advertising agency, PR counsel or sales promotion house for your organization, you've got an advantage George Washington did not have. Call AAR. . . an intelligent way of choosing the agency that best meets your requirements.

NOW LIPTON NOODLES PACKAGES STAND FOR ATTENTION.

Lipton's new packaging concepts for their noodles and sauce products required a more efficient shelf storage system. It had to be easy to load, provide maximum facings and have the capacity to prevent frequent out-of-stock situations. Most importantly, Lipton wanted the packages to remain upright in order to command the attention they deserved.

They knew that Henschel-Steinau would know exactly how to do it.

Our solution was this elegantly versatile unit that is spring loaded to keep packages up front and upstanding. The clear plastic front panels allow Lipton's newly designed graphics to be readily visible and the capacity of the unit accommodates an entire case of noodle and sauce packages. The modular design enables retailers to fit side by side or vertically stacked, single or double width trays into their available space. And, break off sections in the front of the trays allow the display to fit any variations of shelf depth. The acceptance of this display, and its success in both small stores and chains, helped accelerate the national acceptance of these new products.

What we did for Lipton we can do for you. Among companies like Lipton, Henschel-Steinau has built a solid reputation for being more than designers and builders of attention getting point of purchase displays. We're known for our ability to analyze, understand and solve difficult and complex merchandising problems as well.

McCann-Erickson, New York, re-

PORTRAIT:

A tongue in cheek Texan

By Larry Doyle

Michael Hicks says that if they can't take a joke, they might be better off someplace else. Hixo Inc. probably can't help them.

"Most of the stuff we're doing has a degree of humor in it," Mr. Hicks says of his small Austin, Tex.-based agency. "And we generally don't deal with clients who are not funny, or at least don't have an appreciation for it."

Michael Hicks: A certain amount of dice-rolling.

Coming from the director of a five-year-old, eight-person operation with $1.5 million in billings last year, that may sound a bit presumptuous. But Mr. Hicks simply believes humor and creativity are what his company does best, and dealing in anything less usually leads to mutual dissatisfaction.

"We try to have people who have a sense of humor or share a view of life and business that we do," because, he says, "those people we tend to get along with very well. So long as the design quality is high, we have very few problems. The only people I can think of whom we've not meshed as a design group, as a creative group, have been those who've maybe taken themselves too seriously."

This isn't just personal preference. Today's audiences are more sophisticated, Mr. Hicks claims, and more accepting of humor. So laughter sells.

He has his proof: "We did a promotion piece for Texas Monthly on Texas because we were promoting Texas and because at that time, some years ago, we were trying to make the rest of the country aware of Texas, as a market and as sort of an entity."

But rather than indulge in picture postcards and purple prosaics, what Mr. Hicks concocted was a "sort of guidebook thing, real tongue in cheek, a funny little piece." And he got, he says, "a real incredible response to it."

The folks at Texas Monthly thought so, too; in 1981 their book division published an expanded version of the piece as a trade paparback. Written by Mr. Hicks, designed by Hixo Inc., and "Produced in Texas by Texans," "How To Be Texan" contained instruction on breaking in boots, equipping a truck and staying alive in Texas. ("Never," for example, "use the word 'marvelous' in any establishment that serves liquor.")

The book has sold 43,000 copies to date—"And it's still selling," Mr. Hicks adds in his best commercial voice over—and in 1982 spawned the follow-up "Yankees Made Simple/The South Made Simple," which is in its second printing and still selling well. Two other books are planned for early next year, one on peppers—"Sounds weird, I know"—and the other a self-improvement spoof. In addition, a 60-minute cable video version of "Yankees/The South" is in the works, with nine to 13 half-hour installments to follow if it is successful.

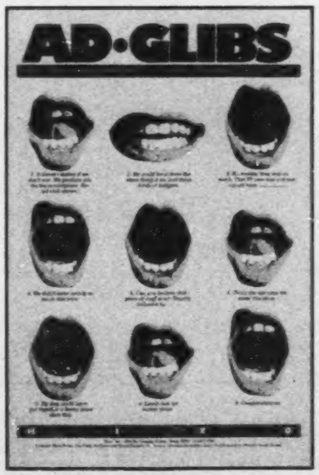
All of this, remember, started as "a funny little" promotional piece in a regional magazine.

Mr. Hicks' faith in creativity and humor is not universally shared, not in a business filled with number crunchers, but he understands. "There is a certain amount of rolling of the dice," he admits, "when you really support a project that's strong in creative and not so strong in supportive numbers, there's a certain amount of gambling involved."

Agencies stopped taking those kind of chances in the late 1970s, Mr. Hicks says, and creativity reached a nadir in the early 1980s. But "what I've seen in 1982, and what seems to be going in 1983—and I've been very encouraged—is there seems to be added interest and support of hard-core creative solutions to problems.

"And there seems to be a growing disregard for the numbers," he adds, "because the market is becoming so segmented that it's very hard to put your finger on exactly who's going to respond and whom you're addressing your primary material to. . . .

"All in all," Mr. Hicks concludes, "it bodes very well for people who are creative intensive." ▬



Hixo's "time-tested ways to get you through the Addies one more year" is all mouth.

Strong dollar makes mark

The strength of the U.S. dollar abroad in 1982 continued to distort growth figures for agencies with strong contributions from overseas units as it did in 1981.

This issue, as in past years, translates monetary items like gross income at exchange rates current to the reporting period and does not restate figures carried in the previous year's issue.

This procedure is in compliance with accepted accounting principles. Dollar growth as a barometer of agency success is a difficult measure, anyway, since distortions occur whether the dollar is up or down.

Agencies particularly affected by exchange rate fluctuations have been permitted to comment on year-earlier figures appearing in the profile. Some have elected to restate figures for previous years, although Advertising Age treats them as unofficial.

Exchange rate fluctuations are one of the vagaries of doing business abroad. If the agency is public, it often publishes a chart showing the growth of its various foreign affiliates in their local currencies, or it may take an exchange rate comparable to both years to demonstrate growth by way of explaining how swings in foreign exchange rates over the entire year affect growth in dollars.

Gross income over $15,000,000

JWT, the largest subsidiary of JWT Group, a holding company formed in June, 1980, had 1982 U.S. volume of $1,115,400,000, all in media.

Its 1981 U.S. volume was $1,025,400,000, all in media.

The agency's 1982 overseas volume was $1,199,800,000 in 1982 and $1,187,300,000 in 1981. Included in the agency's figures are the billings and income of its following U.S. subsidiaries: JWT USA, Thompson Recruitment, Brouillard Communications, and Deitakos. If JWT Co.'s 1981 exchange rates were restated using current foreign exchange rates, the agency's 1981 non-U.S. gross income would be $148,100,000 (instead of $178,000,000) while total gross income would be $301,800,000. Its capitalized billings for 1981 would then be $2,013,200,000, of which $987,800,000 would be overseas volume. Such a restatement would then reflect agency gross income growth of 15% last year over 1981.

The foregoing JWT units, coupled with other subsidiaries operating within the JWT Group, gave the parent company gross income of $433,500,000 on 1982 revenues of $2,891,400,000. In 1981, JWT Group had gross income of $403,900,000 on revenues of $2,694,300,000. Other units within JWT Group include Hill & Knowlton, the world's largest public relations agency; Euro-Advertising International; Lord, Geller, Federico, Einstein; Survival Anglia, and Simmons Market Research Bureau.

In 1982, the agency gained the following: Evans Inc.; Grand Union; Timex Computer Corp. and Timex Medical Products; Toys 'R' Us; Loctite Corp.; Lever Bros. (Impulse body spray); R. T. French Co. (Bold 'n Spicy mustard, Sweater Fresh and Bully toilet cleaner); Eastman Kodak disc camera, and American Postal Workers Union.

It resigned Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co., billing $20,000,000, and lost Rollins Protective Services and Selchow & Righter.

Overseas, the agency gained 60 major accounts or additional assignments, including Kodak disc cameras in France, Holland and India; PepsiCo, Germany; Rolex, Portugal; Gallaher Ltd., John Harvey & Sons and Golden Wonder, United Kingdom; Loctite (Europa), Spain; Ferragamo shoes, Italy; ICL, Australia and Sweden; Goodyear, Canada; Samsonite, Argentina; Oster, Venezuela; Nestle, Mexico; Chesebrough-Pond's, Brazil; Dorman International, Hong Kong; Vida, Malaysia; Ministry of Defense, Singapore; Bacardi and Nippon Goodyear, Japan, and De Beers, South Africa.

It lost Nutricia, Holland; Spillers, U.K.; Zanussi, Italy; Camilia, Switzerland; 20th Century-Fox, Canada; Quaker Oats, Argentina; Parker Pen, Venezuela, Australia, Hong Kong and Singapore; Banco Popular, Peru, and Harlequin Books, Tokyo.

Billings breakdown: Newspapers 9.1%, magazines 10.2%, radio 5.4%, network tv 37.9%, spot tv 21.7%, outdoor 1%, farm publications 1.9%, direct mail 0.6%, other 12.2%.

The agency has 7,443 employes in 114 offices, including 2,836 in 60 U.S. offices. A year ago it had 7,419 employes in 104 offices, including 3,102 in 61 U.S. offices.

A gentleman is always in style.

When you know how to move, everyone follows your lead.

When Fred Astaire first appeared in our pages in 1964, he was a stunning example of GQ's dedication to eloquence and style.

Eighteen years later that dedication has made us America's number one men's magazine...the one all others have to follow for style.

No one shows a man the latest cars, cameras, vacation spots, stereo equipment, or the finest whiskies, wines and cognacs with more style and class than GQ.

No wonder we carried more ad pages in 1982 than any other men's magazine.

We're #1 in rate of newsstand growth, too.

#1 in percentage of readers who are 18-35 and earn 25M + annually.

And our #1 use is as a shopper's guide to the finest products and services available. That makes us #1 in reader action, too.

Our readers are as quick on their feet as Fred Astaire is on his.

IT'S SMART TO DO BUSINESS WITH GENTLEMEN.

PORTRAIT:
L.A.'s not-really-an-agency agency

By Jennifer Pendleton

On a recent evening here, Janet Marie Carlson, Emily Corey and Mary Ellen Dockery returned to their offices dead tired, but with work left to do. They gave themselves five minutes: If ideas didn't start flowing by that time, they vowed they'd go home.

Five minutes passed. And they didn't go home. The three women sat down, and after a session of "screaming and yelling, ranting and raving and throwing out everything we could think of," inspiration struck.

Such is a creative session at the Challenge Unit, one of the latest additions to the Southern California advertising scene and an ad agency whose founder and creative guru, Janet Marie Carlson, doesn't like to think of it as an ad agency at all.

Ms. Carlson describes the Challenge Unit as a "creative-intensive and cost-effective alternative to advertising agencies." Like any agency, the Challenge Unit exists to develop advertising strategies and communications campaigns, she says. But unlike most ad agencies, it goes about its business in an atypical way—both in the physical setting in which strategies and ads are created and in the way in which it is compensated.

The Challenge Unit definitely looks different from most ad agencies. It sits on a corner in the design quarter of West Hollywood—a neighborhood of posh eateries and the offices of testy interior decorators.

There are no signs on its exterior announcing what it is; its elliptical shaped office, which was once the site of an antique dealership, is recessed below street level, encircled by a series of windows that provide its inhabitants with a panoramic view of the streets on either side.

Once again, Ms. Carlson is hoping for a "think shop, a new type of agency."

Inside the office, Ms. Carlson and her staff sit at desks facing each other. There aren't any partitions or dividers between the members of the staff. The arrangement is intentional; it's a setup Ms. Carlson believes fosters creativity by breaking down the barriers between staff members. A fluffy white poodle named Paddington Bear has free reign.

Free reign is important to Ms. Carlson, and this isn't the first time she's set up shop with the hope of establishing something new and different in advertising. Until 1969, she was with Erwin Wasey, Los Angeles, where she was a vp and a member of Interpublic Group of Cos.' creative new product workshop (called, incidentally, the Challenge Unit).

She left the shop to set up her own agency with fellow Erwin Wasey creative Israel Liebowitz and Taylor Rhodes, who was then creative supervisor with Carson/Roberts. They formed Carlson, Liebowitz & Rhodes (now Carlson, Liebowitz & Olshever), describing it at that time as a "think shop, a new type of agency."

It, like Ms. Carlson's current Challenge Unit, operated on a fee basis with a retainer, a move that it hoped would counteract one of the alleged failings of traditional ad agencies—that they often promote the use of inappropriate media for clients because they are paid on the basis of media billings.

Carlson, Liebowitz & Rhodes had to change the way it was paid shortly after it started business, when its first clients insisted on continuing with the traditional method of agency compensation. Ms. Carlson is optimistic that today—as media costs continue to escalate—clients will be more receptive to the idea.

An overdependence upon research, says Ms. Carlson, must take a large part of the blame for a decline in the quality of advertising during the past 10 years.

"The 1960s and the 1970s were creative," she says, "then what happened to ad agencies is that they made research departments [into] gods.

"What has happened at agencies," in Ms. Carlson's view, is that "creatives are experiencing a growth in frustration. There is a focusing on bottom-line profit as opposed to the creative product and the creative process."

That is not the case at the Challenge Unit, Ms. Carlson says. Here, she claims, every staff member brings his or her full creative energies to projects, unshackled by the constraints of research, free from the dictates of account executives, who Ms. Carlson believes function as "go-fers" for clients.

Today, the Challenge Unit is small, with only six fulltime and two part-time employes and three clients. Of course, Ms. Carlson hopes it will grow. But she also hopes growth will not mean an end to the current atmosphere and operational methods.

"I think we can sustain it," says Ms. Carlson optimistically. "The persons who will join us will care enough about the creative process."

Dear Bloomies.

At J/T/C we're firm believers in the classic principles of advertising: Find the customer benefit, that one key point that will motivate the consumer. Then communicate it honestly, clearly and effectively. You see, we're not out to win awards (although we certainly have won more than our share). Irrelevant creativity has no place in today's tough market. We consider valid only that which enhances our client's position.

Which all goes back to the reason J/T/C was founded: To sell our clients, not J/T/C.

PORTRAIT:

Minneapolis' consistent creative

By M. Howard Gelfand

You might say that it was Jesus Christ who made a star out of Tom McElligott. But wait. This isn't one of those born-again stories. In fact, you might just as easily say that it was the Easter Bunny who started Mr. McElligott on his way to fame.

This was 10 years ago, at a time when Mr. McElligott was just another obscure guy writing ad copy in Minneapolis. He was working for Knox Reeves, an agency that had just suffered the crippling loss of its main account, General Mills Corp.

It was then that Mr. McElligott got a call from the Episcopal Diocese of Minnesota. His task: To remind people of the true meaning of Easter.

Mr. McElligott was a natural for the job; his father and father-in-law were both Episcopal clergymen. But religious tradition was not evident in the final product: A picture of Jesus juxtaposed with a picture of the Easter Bunny. Asked the headline, "Which One Rose From the Dead?"

That question soon spread across the nation, first in the form of an ad and then in a poster. And while that was merely the first of many national campaigns for Mr. McElligott, the mixture of irony, humor and pure shock has continued to mark his work —whether he's pitching religion, chickens or pie.

One of Mr. McElligott's most memorable ads is his tv commercial for Poppin Fresh restaurants. An old man approaches an old woman seated next to him at a restaurant. "Bet you're too young to remember chicken pot pies like this," he tells her. Later, he insists that she have a bite. Meanwhile, he says, "Just gonna have me a few bites on this apple pie." Then he assumes a look of pure rapture and giggles as the scene fades out.

That spot earned Mr. McElligott, 39, one of his three Clios last year. His collection of 20 Clios will probably expand this year, and one might come for his commercials for Gold'N Plump chickens.

The commercials depict chickens dressed up as soldiers, or parachuting from the sky. "The chicken ads may be the riskiest we've ever done," says Mr. McElligott. "It's contrary to an awful lot of package goods rules.

"A more likely way to do it would have been to show a family of four at the table, eating chicken."

Mr. McElligott is used to taking risks. Less than two years ago he was senior vp and creative director of Bozell & Jacobs/Minneapolis. He'd been there 10 years, and he got a fat paycheck and stock in the company. But he thought something was missing—"The consistency of the creative product," he says.

"I knew that for me to maintain my interest in the business we had to strive for excellence."

Mr. McElligott had worked with other copywriters and art directors in a venture called Lunch Hour Ltd., doing ads for small companies that were willing to take a few risks.

Finally, Lunch Hour Limited evolved into Fallon McElligott Rice, of which Mr. McElligott is vp and creative director.

Fallon McElligott Rice started with an office, some furniture, five partners and a secretary. The only things missing were accounts. Now the agency has billings of more than $13 million a year. Its other clients include Mr. Coffee on a project basis and ITT Life Insurance. At a time when many agencies are letting people go, Mr. McElligott is looking to boost his staff from 25 to 30.

Mr. McElligott, 39, has won 20 Clios, three in the last year.

All this is a long way from the journey that seemed mapped out for Mr. McElligott in the late 1960s. He was a college English student in Minneapolis then, and when he wasn't in the classroom he was likely to be marching in protest of the Vietnam War. He figured graduate schools and a teaching career were ahead.

But a summer job changed all that. Mr. McElligott was working as a tour guide at a brewery. He reported to the advertising director. One day he was leafing through the boss' copy of ADVERTISING AGE and saw some classified ads for copywriters. He was still interested in teaching, but his wife was pregnant and advertising seemed to pay pretty well.

He wound up applying for a copywriting job at Dayton's department store in Minneapolis.

Mr. McElligott took some Dayton's ads home, rewrote them and was offered the job. The pay was $360 a month.

"I was crushed," he recalls. "I sent them a letter saying, 'Thanks for the offer. I wish you luck at finding an independently wealthy copywriter.' "

The letter made its way up to the personnel manager, who seemed to be surprised that Dayton's paid copywriters the same salary as secretaries. Everyone in the advertising department got a raise, and Mr. McElligott took the job—at $600 a month.

"I was a hero in the advertising department," he says, adding "for about two weeks." That's how long it took him to be promoted to copy chief.

"It happened much too quickly," he says. "I just wasn't ready. I made an incredible number of mistakes, but I tried to make up for it by working very, very hard."

By all accounts he's still working hard—often getting to work at 7 a.m. and going back home to his wife and two children (an 11-year-old daughter and 8-year-old son) at 7 p.m.

Mr. McElligott has long since abandoned thoughts of academia. "My teachers never thought I'd be using my education for something like this," he says. "But, I tell you, I took such joy, I was so consumed by it all, that after a week at Dayton's I never looked back." ■

PORTFOLIO:

Smith, Badofsky & Raffel

We're proud of this campaign, not only because it's handsomely designed and well written, but because it's resourceful. The first order of business was to demonstrate the client's product. This we did by asking a group of noted photographers to supply us with an arresting photo each. Each would challenge the photoengraving skills of CM&H. The ads demonstrated CM&H skills and included endorsement from the most severe critics—the photographers themselves, thus creating a compelling and believable ad message. The story of how the photo was done and how the photoengraving challenges were met interested our market. Costs were kept to a minimum, because CM&H didn't have to pay for the photos, and the engravings themselves were done on downtime. The photographers benefited because their work was seen by thousands of their potential clients—the art directors.

Dan Morrill demands perfect prints.

Pesin, Sydney & Bernard

We do ads that reverberate, that echo and re-echo long after they appear. They don't just ricochet off the surface of people's consciousness, they penetrate it. We develop a cheering section among readers for the products of our clients. We motivate them to become fans, to become actively involved. For example, our campaign for Bon Ami cleanser continues to draw thousands of letters from consumers, applauding its ecological stand and promising their ardent support. Our ad campaigns for Waterford crystal during the past 20 years have been instrumental in developing a special relationship with collectors. To quote a typical letter, "Your ad was special. Many thanks for establishing a level of elegance we can aspire to. Please send me a copy so I can hang it on my wall."

PORTRAIT:

Ideas are music to his ears

By Valerie Mackie

"There is too much copy cat advertising," asks Ethan Revsin.

Ethan Revsin loves big windows, big offices and big paychecks. Much to his disappointment, he doesn't have all of these at his new job at Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, but that doesn't mean he doesn't have "ideas" about how to get them.

Ideas play an integral part in Mr. Revsin s personal as well as professional goals. As new creative director at FCB, ideas are his bread and butter. And it is his ideas that could put him in a bigger office with more windows and a higher paycheck.

He hasn't done too badly up to now, however. After three years at Leo Burnett Co., Chicago, working on such accounts as Marlboro and Schlitz, he moved to pop shop Hurvis, Binzer and Churchill, Chicago. Later he joined Lee King & Partners, Chicago, where he was executive vp-creative director for nine years, handling Hefty bags, Baby Ruth and Butterfingers. Leaving the safety of this well established shop [now merged with Bozell & Jacobs], and seeing little opportunity to advance, he struck up a partnership with Jan Zwiren, who was starting a new agency in Chicago. A personality conflict led to a breakup after two years, he says, and now he's working on Zenith, Coors and Pizza Hut accounts at FCB.

In the 1960s, Mr. Revsin's idea for advertising success was outrageousness. He helped personify this formula in tv commercials for Screaming Yellow Zonkers. It's hard to forget the black, yellow and red cartoon packages that leaped off the grocers' shelves into consumers' carts at the time, but even Mr. Revsin admits he got carried away. Outrageous advertising just doesn't work for bleach or subdivisions.

"It was not a long-term way of doing business," he says.

"Now we've gone whole hog in another direction by trying to play it safe," Mr. Revsin says.

"There are too many jingles, too much music. It is easy to sell a jingle to the client, but there are so many stupid lines to great melodies. How about 'Coke is It'?

"I don't want to hear music, I want to hear ideas," he says repeatedly.

Star presenters also are used too much, he says. James Garner works; Miller Lite's sports stars are great, but so many other presenters don't mix with what they are advertising, Mr. Revsin says.

"If I had a philosophy, which I don't, it would be try to be fresh, not imitative. There is too much copy-cat advertising . . . everyone does it. There is so much imitation of McDonald's emotional sell, and Pepsi's volleyball game on the beach. Where are the ideas? Where are the innovators? Federal Express is an innovator," he points out.

"We need to work harder, really sweat it out. You have to find the idea [or unique selling point] and then figure how to get it across."

Once the idea has developed, attention to detail becomes paramount, Mr. Revsin says. "Details cost money, but it's worth it. You have to watch the language, the art direction, the casting, directing, set design and music down to the littlest detail."

To qualify this remark, he adds, "Let's not forget, though, when you are with a special client, philosophy is out the window."

"We've gone whole hog in another direction by trying to play it safe," says FCB's creative director.

Friendly, human persuasion. It happens when you strike a chord in your consumers, one at a time; when you give them a strong image linked tightly to a solid product concept; when you get them to look at your advertising and say, "That's the way I feel!" or "That's the way I am!" When you accomplish that, you get them to say "That product is for me!" Our philosophy is just this simple: We want to bring products we believe in, to people we believe in.

Last year Charlie and Kautjak helped sell a new car to 2.9 million people.

NATIONAL GEOGRAPHIC

2.9 MILLION new car buyers in 1982 were also readers of National Geographic. And like the rest of our huge readership, 29 million adults every month, they were drawn to National Geographic by our beautifully illustrated articles. Like the one about Charlie and Kautjak Tarkik, Inuit from Hudson Bay.

There's something else remarkable about National Geographic readers: they buy a great diversity of vehicles. From luxury to economy cars, from sporty cars to pick-up trucks. And National Geographic delivers these readers at a lower four color bleed CPM than Time or Newsweek.

Automobile advertising is so effective in National Geographic because the magazine reaches our readers in the place where they are most likely to consider a major purchase: in their home. And because of the magazine's brilliant color reproduction, on our high quality stock, which reproduces advertisements with such richness and clarity.

National Geographic. No other magazine offers you such a powerful advertising combination of audience, environment and efficiency.

National Geographic.
A highly influential environment.

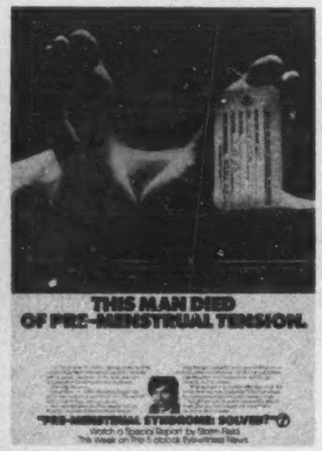
PORTFOLIO:

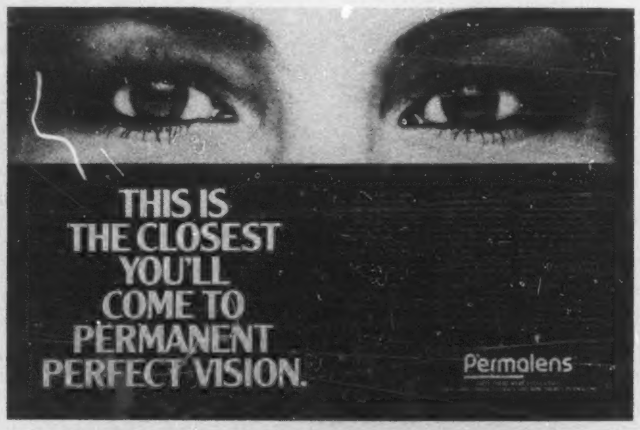
Della Femina, Travisano & Partners

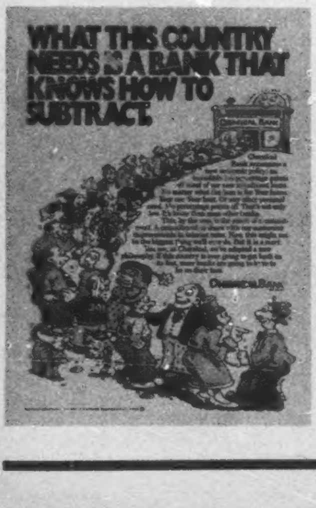
We realize at Della Femina, Travisano & Partners that people don't wake up in the morning searching for our commercials on tv or radio, or shuffling through magazines looking for our advertising.

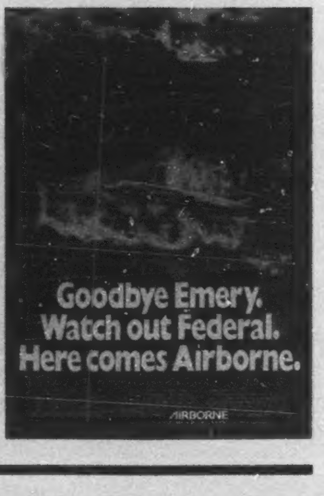
We realize the huge responsibility we have in grabbing people's attention, especially in light of what our clients have to pay for media. Obviously, once you grab their attention, you need to have a strong concept.

So it's relatively simple. There's nothing mystical about it. What it takes is a lot of hard work. You've got to stop people. You've got to interest them. And you've got to sell them.









Goodbye Emery.
Watch out Federal.
Here comes Airborne.

When buying Southern California . . .

RIVERSIDE COUNTY IS A MUST FOR YOUR LIST.

Right "next door" to L.A., Riverside County is as large as New Jersey and is home to 707,900 people, many of whom commute daily to Los Angeles and Orange County.

It's the fastest growing county in Southern California, is fragmented by broadcast and penetrated to a maximum of only 9% by any Los Angeles daily newspaper.

No medium dominates this affluent county like the morning, evening and Sunday Press-Enterprise.

It makes good sense to go with the dominant force in Southern California's Riverside County.

To learn more, call our national advertising manager, Ray Hammond, collect at (714) 684-1200 or talk with your Sawyer-Ferguson-Walker rep.

What is the best kept secret in direct marketing?

You may never have heard of Epsilon, one of the nation's largest independent firms devoted solely to targeted marketing and direct response programs.

But nearly 200 diverse clients in 40 states — businesses and agencies similar to yours — have turned to us to help solve their targeted marketing problems.

Clients like the Fidelity Group of Mutual Funds, Harvard Business Review, Emery Worldwide, Apple Computer, Holiday Inns, Honeywell and Kobs & Brady have sought us out because of the unique combination of computer technology and direct marketing we offer them. They've discovered what may be the best kept secret in direct marketing — Epsilon.

The Perfect Marriage

At Epsilon, the relationship between direct marketing and computer technology has become a perfect marriage.

You already know that segmenting your prospects and customers can have a measurable impact on your business.

But you can't do it effectively without a sophisticated marketing information system.

We've got it. And our clients believe it's the best support system available today for the direct marketing professional.

It's got all the "bells and whistles" you'd expect — but we take it one step further. We fit the system to your own special needs so it becomes your centralized marketing database. You can store and retrieve virtually any kind of detailed information about virtually any number of individuals — prospects, customers, former customers, and so on.

We'll give you your own personal desk top computer, so you can control data right in your own office, if you wish. And while you'll have all the marketing advantages of an in-office computer and word processor, you'll also be tied into a larger computer system for file maintenance and big processing jobs.

"That Doesn't Look Like a Computer Letter."

Precisely. It shouldn't look like one.

Epsilon has pioneered 'super personalization' — letters that look so personal you want to read them ... and respond. Any information you can store, you can use in a letter — titles, addresses, purchase dates and amounts, types of products or businesses, subscription expire dates, special interests — anything.

You'll want to use personalization as an important technique to recognize, involve, and motivate readers — to encourage high quality response — to communicate like only personal, one-to-one correspondence can. Epsilon helps you develop, create, and produce measurable, highly responsive, top quality direct mail. Because it's the only kind of direct mail we produce.

Beyond Recency, Frequency, Amount

Today it's not enough to have a marketing database that can store just basic information. For superior market segmentation and targeted messages, and to develop a profile of both prospect and customer, you need to go beyond recency, frequency, and amount of purchase.

That's why Epsilon's market opinion research services exist. It's a natural extension of direct marketing. Through market research, you learn key facts about your constituents. And you can collect, analyze, store, and use this data to target the right message to the right person at the right time.

Fulfillment With a Difference

If you've ever had to fulfill a request for an order, subscription, or just for information, you know what a painful process it can be.

But fast, high quality fulfillment is critically important. Because if you can't service a customer's needs, he won't be a customer for very long.

That's why Epsilon views fulfillment as a premium service designed for clients who recognize the value of the customer relationship. High quality fulfillment is an investment that pays off in satisfied, lasting customers.

So if you decide to use our fulfillment services, we'll recruit, train, and supervise a separate group of people just for you. This group, although employed by Epsilon, is completely dedicated to your individual fulfillment needs — whatever is necessary to make fulfillment the highest quality operation. Publications like The Economist and Science, and membership organizations like the United Airlines Red Carpet Club and the Inter•Continental Hotels Six Continents Club, recognize it's the best solution to full-service fulfillment available today.

Is Epsilon for You?

Now that we've let you in on the best kept secret in direct marketing, perhaps you'll confide in us.

There's a coupon below. Use it to find out how Epsilon can help you. If you'd rather call, ask for John Groman, Senior Vice President. Call toll free:

Can you really afford to spend all that time and money on indirect response advertising?

Today, you need more than "seen/associated." You need "saw/bought!"

Most advertising doesn't tell you what happened after someone "saw" or "associated" or "read." It's *in*direct response advertising. Uncertain and costly.

At Cinamon Associates, everything is measurable direct response advertising. Effective and cost-effective. You know who responded, what they bought and spent, how much it cost you... and more. So you're certain, in these uncertain economic times, how much your efforts were worth.

Which is why it's worth it to write or call us, today.

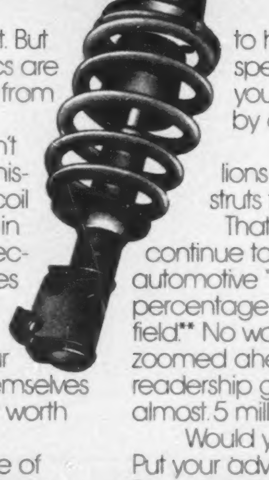
Look who's dancing the MacPherson strut.



You'll never see Fred and Ginger do it. But more and more weekend mechanics are learning all the steps of the strut right from the pages of MECHANIX ILLUSTRATED.

Actually. The MacPherson strut isn't danceable, it's replaceable. It's a sophisticated automobile shock absorber, coil spring, and suspension mount found in more and more of today's cars...especially ones with front wheel drive. It saves space, saves weight and therefore, saves fuel.

Now with a little help from MI, our readers are learning to replace-it-themselves at a savings of about 50%...definitely worth dancing about.

Helping the do-it-yourselfer is one of MI's main missions. And there's lots of them to help. It's estimated that by 1995 spending by the automotive do-it-yourselfers will increase over 1980 by a whopping 224%.*

That means billions and billions of dollars for everything from struts to spark plugs to starter switches.

That's why in the last year, we continue to run the highest percentage of automotive "how-to" pages and the highest percentage of four-color editorial in our field. No wonder SMRB shows that we've zoomed ahead of the pack with the largest readership growth in the field...reaching almost 5 million adults.

Would you like to do a dance of joy? Put your advertising in MECHANIX ILLUSTRATED Then strut all the way to the bank.

LAST YEAR WE TOOK A LOT OF MAJOR COMPANIES FOR A RIDE.

Just ask Coca-Cola, Thom McAn shoes, Mattel Electronics, Kodak, Southland Corporation's 7-Eleven stores, Warner Communications' Malibu Fun Centers, or any of the other companies that reached almost one billion people by sponsoring bicycle motocross races with us in 1982.

One billion people?

Bicycle motocross?

Impossible.

Not at all, because we at Roker Ventures put you in touch with this nation's second largest family activity: cycling, and specifically, bicycle motocross, or BMX. More than 25,000,000 BMX-type bicycles inhabit American neighborhoods today, and the benefits of supporting BMX competition have been realized by many of the world's most successful corporations.

We achieve these amazing results by not limiting our promotions, and your exposure, to just one form of media—we utilize them all. Television, radio, newspaper, magazine, signage, direct mail, and point of sale, plus we offer you prime locations for one-on-one sales opportunities.

We put the sport of BMX on network television with several popular shows including Chips, Real People, and Kidsworld to name a few, and we now produce the only youth sports program currently on network TV, the ESPN BMX series, with over six months of programming contracted for 1983, and a potential audience of almost 100,000,000 people.

And for the last five years we've staged the World Championship of Bicycle Motocross, the most widely publicized and most prestigious race in the sport, not off in some Midwestern cow pasture, but at the Tropicana Hotel and Country Club in Las Vegas this past Christmas.

Last year we took our sponsors for a ride through practically every state in the Union and into nearly a dozen foreign countries as well with our BMX events. Almost one billion people at a CPM of less than a quarter, and for 1983, our youth sporting events will include world class soccer, aerobics, and a two day cycling classic at the site of the 1984 Summer Olympics.

If you'd like to be taken for this kind of ride in 1983, or you'd just like some proof of these incredible claims, give us a call or drop us a line.

We'll be glad to help you pedal to the top.

You may never see the man with the most living descendents*...

. . . but you can develop quite a following on WKZO-TV.

More men 18-49 turn to WKZO-TV than to any other station in the Kalamazoo-Grand Rapids market, 6 a.m. to Midnight, Sunday through Saturday. The same is true for women 18-49. In fact, WKZO-TV is the #1 station among Total Adults in the market the latest census shows to be the fastest growing Michigan market ranked among the nation's top 100.

The adults there are active consumers, too. According to S&MM 1982 Survey of Buying Power, Kalamazoo-Grand Rapids is 38th in the nation in total retail sales, 34th in eating and drinking place sales and 21st in department store sales.

So if you want to see sales multiply, ask your Avery-Knodel representative about WKZO-TV today.

*According to the Guinness Book of World Records, Capt. Wilson Kettle of Newfoundland died in 1963 leaving 582 living descendents—11 children, 65 grandchildren, 201 great-grandchildren and 305 great-great-grandchildren.

King Kong climbs again for his 50th

By STUART EMMRICH

New York—Beat those jungle drums. Break out the klieg lights. Entice Fay Wray out of retirement. Kong is back.

To commemorate the 50th anniversary of the classic RKO film's premiere in New York, King Kong—or rather an 84-ft.-high inflatable replica of the mighty Kong—once again will scale the heights of the Empire State Bldg.

Part publicity stunt, part nostalgia, the April 7 reappearance of King Kong is being masterminded by Robert Keith & Co., a San Diego-based company that designs oversize inflatable advertising displays for such clients as Pepsi, Coke and Budweiser.

Israel to combat image with ads

By RUTH SINAI

Tel Aviv—The Israeli government is out to change a public image seriously eroded by its invasion of Lebanon.

The Israeli Ministry of Tourism on May 1 will launch hard-hitting tv commercials aimed at reversing its image slide in the U.S. and the disastrous fall-off of tourists from the U.S.

The commercials, to run on the three major U.S. networks, are part of a three-year contract just signed with Needham, Harper & Steers' Issues & Images in New York to develop an advertising campaign to polish the country's tarnished name (AA, Jan. 31).

"Come to Israel, come stay with friends," is the theme. Spots show a hospitable, reliable, English-speaking Israeli prototype; one shows him as a fisherman rowing across the Sea of Galilee to the same shore where Christ spent much of his boyhood. He's rushing to meet two American friends waiting for him. The commercial combines beautiful scenery with history and a friendly host.

A print ad will show a cab driver saying: "The tourists asked me to take them to the best restaurant in town—so I took them to my house."

The campaign is budgeted at $2 million for this year.

"We hope to fight the American media with its own weapons," says Zvi Rimon, special aide to the minister of tourism.

Mr. Rimon, a former journalist, said American media coverage of the war in Lebanon has damaged Israel's once-booming tourist trade. The idea now, he says, is to renew the dialog that once existed between Americans and Israel.

The ads will lay the groundwork for a

Lipton tests calorie-conscious Trim soups

By GAY JERVEY

Hoping national calorie-counting can do for soup what it did for beer and soft drinks, Thomas J. Lipton Inc. is testing Trim diet soup mixes, a new line containing only 10 calories a serving.

Although Englewood Cliffs, N.J.-based Lipton is keeping mum, admitting only that such a controlled-store test exists, industry sources say the product is in Boise and Portland, Me., at the least. It is being supported by newpaper ads and spot tv and radio from SSC&B.

The Unilever unit is linking Trim to an active-America theme. Spots reportedly show people in motion; in short, burning calories. Packaging further verbalizes these graphics: Each envelope has a section, near the bottom, called "Trimtalk," offering bits of advice on how to burn off calories.

The Trim tv spot, made up largely of singing dialog between an announcer and a chorus, goes: "Trim is in. . .the new low-calorie soup in four great tastes and satisfying flavors." It comes in herb vegetable, chicken, beef and beefy tomato flavors, with six envelopes per package, retailing for about 63¢.

If the approach proves viable, soup companies are guaranteed to go the way of their cold beverage brethren and begin battling it out on the calorie front, a battle zone that already occupies their salt vs. salt-free troops. "Yes, we're watching Lipton's progress very carefully," says Herb Baum, Campbell Soup Co.'s vp-marketing and head of its soup division.

Because A.C. Nielsen Co. is handling the test, Lipton is avoiding normal distribution channels. But one distributor in regular contact with Lipton's sales force says they seem "very excited" about it, and that he, personally, would "love to handle a product like that." Grassroots reaction is similar: A receptionist at a Boise distributor said her teen age daughter, constantly in a state about weight, is eating Trim.

For now, there isn't much on the diet front from the major soup marketers. Interestly, Campbell last year terminated a low-cal experiment of its own. The company had designated 16 of its less bulky—ergo, caloric—brands as Lite. "We didn't change the content of the soups at all," explained a company spokesman.

"However, the problem was people seemed to think we had. There was confusion that something had been taken out. So we have gone back to the regular Campbell packaging," he said.#

JWT, FCB gain $20 million in S.C. Johnson lines

Racine, Wis.—S.C. Johnson & Son has assigned Agree and Enhance haircare lines and Glade air fresheners to JWT, Chicago, and Soft Sense skin lotion to FCB. Both are current Johnson shops. The brands, representing about $20 million in billings, were with NH&S, which resigned them due to a Johnson conflict policy (AA, Jan. 17).

Greyhound returns to airwaves with new drive

Phoenix—Greyhound Lines next week will launch its first new campaign in more than two years with an advantage-oriented campaign targeted at bus riders. The tv campaign, which is breaking in 10 major markets, uses vignettes in three spots and tells each story from two points of view—the travelers' and those waiting for the passenger's arrival. Radio also supports. Agency is Bozell & Jacobs/Southwest.

'Esquire' chiefs plot expansion

By STUART J. ELLIOTT

The owners of Esquire and 13-30 Group are planning an ambitious multimedia expansion program, with a $25 million price tag, designed to help quintuple their revenues within five years.

The program involves a $10 million venture-capital fund, cable and movie projects, books, three new magazines, enhanced field marketing services and entry into Europe.

Development of the program began when Phillip Moffitt and Chris Whittle, president and chairman, respectively, became convinced that they finally had turned the corner with Esquire, which they acquired in 1979. "We now sit down and say, 'Hmmm, what do we do next?' " Mr. Moffitt said. "We're saying, 'Over the next three years, guys, we're going to put $25 million on the table.' "

That money will fund an expansion strategy meant to create, in Mr. Whittle's words, "a family of companies with different bodies of shareholders, reflecting an entrepreneurial style. Rather than a highly tiered conglomerate, there'll be a lot of different, independent units."

This structuring is patterned after their current opera-

Datril again tries price vs. Tylenol

New York—It's 1975 revisited: Bristol-Myers is running a repeat performance of its classic Datril comparative ad campaign. That campaign said Datril was superior to Extra-Strength Tylenol since the pain relievers were exactly the same and Datril cost less.

The revival obviously is not due to any award-winning performance eight years ago, since the original Datril campaign lost at least $10 million for Bristol-Myers. But times have changed, say company officials, who now believe the 1975 campaign simply may have been ahead of its time.

This time around, Datril, now known as Datril 500, will spend at an annual national rate of $26 million in its first six weeks on tv, with $1.5 million being spent during the first two weeks (which began March 15) and another $1.5 million going out during the next four weeks. However, Bristol-Myers is not prepared to disclose what it will spend by year's end, said John Loden, director-analgesics marketing.

"We will continue an aggressive program through 1983. It will be competitive and give us a presence," Mr. Loden said, adding that dollars will not be diverted from the company's other analgesic

Aid nations via electronics: Ney

By MORRIE GELMAN

Los Angeles—The creative community here was asked last week to back a concept that would create a sort of worldwide communications peace corps.

Edward N. Ney, chairman-chief executive officer of Young & Rubicam, told a luncheon meeting of the Television Academy of Arts & Sciences about a plan—the "Electronics Marshall Plan"—that would be modeled after the post-World War II Marshall Plan that aided economic recovery in Europe.

Mr. Ney said his proposal has been 18 months in development. Its objective would be to bring education and information via communications to underdeveloped countries. He said the goal would be "to overcome the perception through-

world news roundup

Paris—Ted Bates Worldwide, J. Walter Thompson Co., Benton & Bowles and Foote, Cone & Belding have joined Young & Rubicam and TBWA in a new group, Ethics & Freedom in Advertising, which is examining grounds for a lawsuit in France or through the Common Market, citing the expanded tv space-selling role the government has granted Havas and Publicis on the new third tv network (AA, March 14).

Geneva—The All England Lawn Tennis Assn., which will decide next month who gets European tv rights to the Wimbledon tennis games, is sparking a bidding war between state tv authorities, who traditionally broadcast the games, and commercial tv entrepreneurs.

London—Cinzano U.K. has moved its $9.4 million account to Foote, Cone & Belding from Collett Dickenson Pearce, following a directive from Cinzano's headquarters in Switzerland. FCB handles Cinzano in 15 world markets.

Zurich—Switzerland's low-price Swatch watch made its European debut last week via a multi-million-dollar media campaign by McCann-Erickson. Made by the Eta subsidiary of Asuag, Switzerland's leading watch company, the $20 watch is being tested in the U.S. and will roll out in West Germany in May.

Lima—The Peruvian government has tightened the reins on imported commercials, permitting only 49% of any commercial to be produced outside the country. Ad execs here fear the government will bow to pressure of local producers and eventually ban all foreign production.

Crest claims get out there first

Colgate ad plan decays

By NANCY GIGES

New York—Colgate-Palmolive is apparently gearing up for a new campaign for Colgate toothpaste, claiming new research suggests its fluoride dentifrice not only prevents tooth decay but actually reverses the process that leads to cavities.

But its impact is diluted by the fact that rival Procter & Gamble got there first. P&G has broken a new print campaign for top-selling Crest that makes the same claim: "Dramatic new research shows that advanced formula Crest can actually help reverse the process that can lead to tooth decay, even after it's already started."

Early last week, Colgate announced it would be presenting new scientific data on how Colgate toothpaste can strengthen weak tooth enamel. The data were to have been revealed at a dental gathering in Cincinnati, where P&G is headquartered. The announcement also noted that the company plans "a major educational effort to consumers and dentists on the new findings" and quoted A. Courtenay Shepard, vp-general manager of Colgate U.S., as calling the research a "significant new step in our efforts to utilize the most modern technology to improve the nation's oral health."

At first, a spokesman said Colgate initially planned newspaper ads, set to break March 20, and a more expanded program later on. He said he would get answers to other questions, but did not return subsequent phone calls. Later, a company spokeswoman said the company was not expanding on the press release.

While the marketing and scientific people at Colgate were touting the new findings as significant, the financial people began telling Wall Street the research is no big deal.

Shortly after the press release was issued, at least three Wall Street analysts covering Colgate received phone calls from Colgate investment contacts to tell them the scientific data being presented that week were insignificant. The analysts noted that it was somewhat unusual to receive such a phone call, but they pointed out that Colgate stock, which had been performing poorly, moved up 1½ points in one day for no apparent reason. One speculated that Colgate people thought the press release prompted the movement.

Industry sources pointed out that any fluoridated toothpaste can

Generale set to buy Mother's

By JANET NEIMAN

Generale Biscuits of America, Elizabeth, N.J., has negotiated an agreement to acquire Mother's Cake & Cookie Co. of Oakland, Cal., pending approval by the U.S. and French governments.

The acquisition of Mother's, which has annual sales of about $75 million, would "complete the circuit" of Generale Biscuits' growing U.S. operations by giving it coast-to-coast presence, according to Pierre Jean Everaert, president-chief executive officer of the U.S. arm of the Paris-based company. It purchased Burry Biscuit Co. from Quaker Oats in 1980, and last year bought Niles, Ill.-based Salerno-Megowen, which was divested under government mandate by British-based Huntley & Palmer when the latter company was purchased by Nabisco.

Generale Biscuits markets cookies internationally under the LU label (derived from the initials of the original company's founder Louis Lefevre-Utile).

In the past year, Generale Biscuits has rolled its upscale Burry LU line from its original East Coast markets through the Midwest, using the Salerno distribu-

P&G's 'cookie monster' on Kansas City rampage

By JANET NEIMAN

Kansas City, Mo.—Lynn Nelson, from Weatherby Lake near here, first heard about the new line of Duncan Hines chocolate chip cookies at her Weight Watchers class, where cohorts were praising themselves for resisting the direct-mail samples sent to 60% of the 493,500 households in this metropolitan area.

"So I got some for my son. Of course, I tried them; I haven't been back to Weight Watchers since. They're the greatest, the best store-bought cookies. They're habit-forming. There are very few products I'm so gung-ho about."

Three bags of Duncan Hines cookies and a bag of Nabisco's I Screams cookies adorned Mrs. Nelson's grocery cart when she was interviewed recently at a Safeway store here. Pointing to the chocolate chip cookies, she admitted: "I'm hoping I can eat these and my son'll eat those," glancing at the I Screams.

Less than two months after entering its Duncan Hines cookies into market tests here. Procter & Gamble appears to have another winner in a category entirely new for the company, creating a cookie monster that could cause some well-known little elves to hang themselves from the branches of the Hollow Tree.

One grocery warehouse that typically moves 300 cases of other packaged-cookie brands on a store ad reported moving 972 cases of Duncan Hines cookies in one week recently. Grocery buyers already were reporting that Chicago baker Schulze & Burch, which makes the cookies for P&G, was having problems supplying some flavors in the chocolate-chip line, which includes plain, peanut butter, mint, butterscotch and almond fudge. Even buyers who expected the line to be successful are having trouble fathoming its impact:

- "This is probably the most successful introduction of a new item our people have seen in a long, long time," said James Klein, a P&G foods buyer at Milgram Food Stores, a major local chain.
- "There's no doubt they're outselling all the others," said Ron Ferguson, the order clerk at one Save Mart combination store.
- "They've done better than even P&G thought they would," said Terry Ryan, the buyer for Safeway here.
- "They could sell the crap out of 'em [nationally] now, but production will hold them back, as opposed to fear [they'll] fail," said a buyer who asked to remain anonymous.

Retail shelves feel Always squeeze

By JENNIFER ALTER

Minneapolis—Procter & Gamble's re-entry into the feminine hygiene market is causing big retail headaches in this North Central region, as it puts the squeeze on store shelf space.

The coming test of Always, a 10-item line of maxipads, minipads and pantiliners, plus the competitive reaction it has ignited, is forcing retailers to make some tough decisions about inventory. And no marketer, P&G included, is escaping the effects.

"I originally thought I would take on the whole [Always] line, but I've had second thoughts," says a retail buyer for a major distributor. "I ordered everything but the pantiliners in the 48 size, and then when Kimberly-Clark came in I thought, 'there's just not going to be enough room for all of this.' "

That buyer says he already has put the 12-count minipads and the 12-count deodorant maxipads on his discontinued list, and he has serious questions about even the 12-count nondeodorant maxipads.

Jim Fix, manager of buying services for Red Owl, a major distributor here, is running into the same obstacle. Although he is taking on all 10 Always items, he has ordered only the 30-count packages of Johnson & Johnson's new "super" Sure & Natural and Tampax's "super" Maxithins.

Tampax, which had been testing its super in Atlanta and Pittsburgh since last fall, has just moved it into the Twin Cities. Sure & Natural's super form is being rolled out across the country.

Of his rationale in ordering all 10 Always items, Mr. Fix says, "I think it's important to give new brands a chance," he says. "The smaller counts become almost a trial size." The Sure & Natural and Maxithins products "to me were just line extensions," he continues.

Presumably to help force distribution of the new Maxishield, Tampax is planning a coupon drop on the super product only.

Four A's readies new credibility credo

By TOM BAYER

Dorado P.R.—Proposals aimed at improving advertising and its image dotted the Southern region meeting of the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies here last week.

Leonard S. Matthews, president of the Four A's, said the only real way to improve the image of advertising is by actions. To that end, he said, the association is proposing a new credibility credo that is simpler than the original Creative Code adopted in 1962. The new credo, still being hammered out, encourages advertising that contains objective claims supportable by professional or scientific authority, authoritative testimonials and only supportable implied claims. The credo also urges that ads be free of misleading statements and any disparagement of competitors, and inoffensive to public decency.

Jerry Della Femina, chairman of Della Femina, Travisano & Partners, New York, told Four A's members that the lack of interest in advertising on the part of young people is the industry's single biggest challenge. "Is advertising to become a decaying, dying industry? Where will the greatest creative minds come from?" he asked.

Creative people are becoming older, and "I don't know of any up-and-coming creative people under 30. The best and brightest just aren't there."

To solve that problem, Mr. Della Femina proposed creation of a Four A's-sponsored Bill Bernbach Awards competition in which the 50 best young writers and 50 best young art directors would be recognized and encouraged. It would be named in honor of the late founder of Doyle Dane Bernbach.

Referring to advertising criticism, Mr. Matthews said: "We must maintain that advertising is salesmanship. It is unabashed advocacy, and whether it succeeds in its role as the most efficient kind of selling depends upon its being allowed to continue as a strong advocate for products and services versus becoming a public utility kind of vehicle for consumer information."

Mr. Matthews added that it is his personal opinion that comparative advertising is the greatest single source of misleading advertising today. "It does not serve consumers well, it diminishes the reputation of both companies, tars the image of advertising generally and I'd like to see it go away," he said, noting however that the FTC encourages comparative ads even though 40% of the complaints brought before the NAD stem from comparative advertising.

Jack Bowen, chairman of Four A's and president of Benton & Bowles, again asked for help in his plan to improve advertising's image, by improving the product and by

Burger tiff shifts ad awareness

By JOSEPH M. WINSKI

Burger King's controversial and attention-getting comparative advertising campaign of last fall seems to have produced only a short-lived boost in awareness of the company's advertising.

adWatch

Looked at another way, Burger King began its latest wave of McDonald's-chiding advertising in the nick of time. (It began early this month.)

Ad awareness in the fast-food industry in February, six months after Burger King fired its first salvo, was virtually the same as it was before the "burger wars" began. Which is to say that McDonald's once again has a commanding lead over Burger King in advertising awareness.

According to adWatch, a monthly survey of consumer awareness of advertising, McDonald's ad awareness rose 3.9 percentage points in February, to 43.6% of all respondents asked to identify the fast-food advertising that first came to

Here's the word on surveys about burger favorites

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

Sometimes it is just a matter of how you ask the question.

When Burger King sent a survey company into the field to query fast-food fanciers on which they preferred, flame-broiled or fried hamburgers, they found a 3-to-1 preference for the open-flame, or flame-broiled, method—Burger King's own. The Miami-based company and its agency, J. Walter Thompson USA, immediately incorporated that finding into a comparative campaign that was launched last fall and relaunched a few weeks ago (AA, March 7).

But when Leo Shapiro, president of the Chicago-based market research company, Leo Shapiro & Associates, conducted his own survey, he rephrased the question and came up with distinctly different answers. "If you have two methods of cooking and it's a verbal survey, the choice of words could influence the outcome," Mr. Shapiro said in explaining why he decided to conduct his own survey.

Burger surveys

Mr. Shapiro had been asked to comment on the Burger King comparison campaign by "Business Times," the morning business-news program on Entertainment & Sports Programming Network. Before agreeing to comment, Mr. Shapiro had his company survey 308 fast-food customers.

After establishing that the person interviewed had eaten at a fast-food restaurant in the last six months, the interviewer asked: "Thinking about the way that you really like to have your hamburger cooked when you eat at a fast-food restaurant, do you prefer a hamburger that is grilled on a hot stainless-steel grill or cooked by passing the raw meat through an open gas flame?"

The answer? Shapiro's researchers found 53% preferred their burgers from that stainless-steel grill. This means they opted for McDonald's fried over Burger King's open flame.

Then the interviewer added yet another dimension that further widened the gap.

"Here are descriptions of how two fast-food restaurants handle hamburgers after they are cooked but before they are served," the questioner said. "The chain that grills on a hot stainless-steel griddle serves its cooked hamburgers at the proper temperature without having to use a microwave oven. And the chain that uses the gas flame puts the hamburgers after they are cooked into a microwave oven before serving them. Just knowing this, from which of these two chains would you prefer to buy a hamburger?"

McDonald's hot stainless-steel griddles and microwave-less restaurants won again. This time they pulled in an 85% preference, or a 5½-to-1 margin over BK.

As "Business News" marketing reporter Bob Krulwich quipped, when the fried vs. flame-broiled issue is brought up next time, McDonald's should answer with one word: "Microwave."

A Burger King spokesman said the "full cooking process" is flame-broiled "but the flame-broiling tends to be a one-at-a-time cooking process.

The hamburgers do come off one-at-a-time, so in rush periods the microwave is used to preserve the "optimum serving temperature" and to melt the cheese.

Burger King continues to refuse to provide details on its survey, the name of the company that conducted it or to describe the survey method beyond saying it was national, done by a nationally known public opinion company, that the question asked was, "Do you prefer your hamburgers flame-broiled or fried?" and that they are completely satisfied with the survey.

"We found the word 'fried' was unappetizing," Mr. Shapiro said. "You don't eat fried foods. The word 'cooked' is neutral, and 'open gas' is more precise but less appetizing [than Burger King's "flame-broiled" description]."

The most significant finding of the survey, in Mr. Shapiro's mind, is how important the method of cooking and serving was to the hamburger consumer.

"Both surveys are true," Mr. Shapiro said. "But what you learn if you put the two surveys together is that the method of serving is very important to customers."#

Burger ads shift in awareness

mind of all seen or heard in the previous 30 days. An increase or decrease of more than 2.7 points is statistically significant under adWatch methodology.

Burger King, meanwhile, suffered a 7.3 point drop in awareness in February. That was one of the steepest declines of any advertiser surveyed since adWatch began last April. Only McDonald's 10-point decline last October, when Burger King's comparative campaign was at its zenith, was substantially larger than BK's February drop.

The net result: McDonald's led BK 45.6% to 8.4% last September—and 43.6% to 10.8% last month.

It's important to note that the survey was conducted from Feb. 1 through Feb. 21, before Burger King launched what it calls its "second round of comparative advertising" during the first weekend this month. That spot claims hamburger eaters prefer flame-broiled burgers (Burger King-style) to the fried version (McDonald's-style) "by nearly 3 to 1."

Whether the new effort has the same dramatic effect as the first, which helped triple BK's ad awareness in October, is debatable. For one thing, some skeptics say, the "shock value" inherent in last fall's campaign has dissipated.

In addition, McDonald's is continuing to spend heavily on its "McDonald's and You" campaign, which is attracting considerable attention. The campaign broke Jan. 15 and may be a major reason for the opposite movements in awareness by McDonald's and Burger King last month.

In another fast-food development last month, Wendy's for the first time fell from the top three in ad awareness. It was replaced by Hardee's, whose advertising was named by 4.2% of the respondents (up from 3.4% in January), compared with the 3.7% who named Wendy's. That was Wendy's lowest adWatch score yet.

AdWatch, a joint project of Advertising Age and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb., measures ad awareness by asking consumers to name the first advertising that comes to mind of all seen or heard in the previous 30 days in each of 20 product categories. The poll, conducted by telephone, covered a national random sample of 1,250 consumers in February.

As expected (AA, Feb. 28), Diet Coke in February became the No. 3 soft drink in advertising awareness. Advertising for the new product, available in about 80% of the country during the survey period, was named by 7.8% of consumers as that first coming to mind, up from 5.8% in January. Diet Coke knocked 7UP (a 6.9% score in February, down from 7.3%) from the top three in soft-drink ad awareness for the first time since adWatch began.

Coca-Cola remained No. 1 with a score of 22.4% (down from 25.2%) and Pepsi-Cola again was No. 2, with a score of 18% (vs. 18.6%).

The only advertiser other than Burger King and McDonald's to post a significant (more than 2.7 points) change in ad awareness in February was Eastman Kodak, which continued its post-Christmas slide with a 3.4 point drop to 18.1%. Canon was No. 2 in cameras and equipment with a score of 11.2%, and Polaroid was No. 3 with 9.9%.

The only new category leaders last month were Miller, replacing Budweiser in beer, and Estee Lauder, replacing Charlie in cosmetics and fragrances.#

Godfrey's ad style was revolutionary

By JAMES P. FORKAN

New York—The death here March 16 of broadcasting personality Arthur Godfrey at 79 brought forth fresh tributes to his unique ability to blend a folksy, avuncular style with the boldness of an iconoclast. This talent, epitomized by informality and irreverent humor, revolutionized advertising.

His manner of delivery of commercials as a CBS radio and tv performer captivated audiences and earned him, besides millions of dollars, honored status as a legendary communicator.

Mr. Godfrey, who died at Mount Sinai Hospital from emphysema and pneumonia, was estimated, at his peak of popularity in the mid-1950s, to have had a CBS Radio morning audience of 40 million people and more than 80 sponsors, plus 85 million viewers for his two prime time tv series. His shows reportedly translated into 12% of CBS' total revenues at the time.

He began his radio series in 1945 and was being paid $1 million a year by CBS by 1950. He was perhaps most closely identified with Thomas J. Lipton Inc.'s tea and soups. "The ole redhead," as he called himself, would ad-lib his commercial spiels rather than stick to the script. In 1960, Mr. Godfrey labeled as "jerks" the admen at Lipton, Toni Co. and their agencies who were made uncomfortable by his relatively freewheeling approach—an approach that somehow always brought the required copy points to his listeners.

"Arthur Godfrey's Talent Scouts," which began its tv run in December, 1948, was followed, in January, 1949, by "Arthur Godfrey & His Friends." In 1950, Lipton's parent, Lever Bros., joined Mr. Godfrey's radio sponsor roster.

In summer, 1958, faced with a major change in tv/radio sponsorship, Mr. Godfrey told viewers in a live commercial for Chase & Sanborn coffee that "Lipton tea is the best that you can buy, and I think Chase & Sanborn holds the same top spot in coffee." Two years later, when he was preparing a "Candid Camera" tv revival, Mr. Godfrey became spokesman for rival Tetley tea, and in a 1960 Advertising Age interview he said he saw no hypocrisy in that move since "Lipton is a good product, so is Tetley. As far as I'm concerned, it's superior, but I didn't know about it for the 12 years I was on Lipton." (Mr. Godfrey in the early 1950s also gave up Chesterfield cigarets as a sponsor and as a smoke for health reasons; in 1959, he lost a lung to cancer).

The CBS veteran, who in 1957 gave up his Wednesday tv show, saw his tv career dip following his 1959 surgery, but he remained a formidable figure in radio. CBS in 1968 expanded his half-hour "Arthur Godfrey Time" to seven days weekly from five, and by the time he left CBS Radio in spring 1972, he accounted for nearly 20% of the network's ad volume; he was replaced by various brief news and feature programs.

Following that, he did at least two syndicated radio shows, in 1972 and in 1981, several CBS prime time specials and numerous ad endorsements for Bristol-Myers (for Disolve soluble aspirin), Chrysler Corp. and other national and local accounts.

Informal, ad-lib delivery made Arthur Godfrey popular with audiences and advertisers as well. In this 1969 photo he touts Aunt Jane's pickles, one of many sponsors of his shows.

Colgate-Palmolive also had backed some of his CBS tv specials in 1968-70, and used him as ad spokesman for its toothpaste and Axion detergent. The Axion contract ended after two years in 1970, when Mr. Godfrey said, "I felt like a cuckolded husband" upon learning that Axion was a pollutant because of its phosphate content. Earlier, Mr. Godfrey, an ardent environmentalist, fought for and won a disclaimer in Axion ads. Those ads said that while Axion does pollute some, Colgate was working on the problem.#

DFS gets Toyota in Australia

New York—Dancer Fitzgerald Sample has moved a giant step closer to becoming Toyota Motor Sales' worldwide ad agency.

Australian Motor Industries, the manufacturer and distributor of Toyota vehicles, gave DFS-Australia, a new agency formed largely to serve Toyota, more than $12 million worth of car and truck business in Australia.

DFS, a Toyota agency in the U.S., Saudi Arabia and Canada, last year gained the auto maker's business in Tokyo after linking up with the Nippon Design Center, a graphics-oriented production house owned by a host of major Japanese marketers, including Toyota (see related story, Page 10).

DFS also is trying to gain a presence in the Philippines, Hong Kong and Singapore, markets that Toyota is trying to build. "With the Australia base, we are looking to developments in that part of the world," said William Vickery, chairman of DFS International.#
